THE CHAIRMAN: Good morning.

Good morning everyone. Not quite as many in the "everyone" as there have been on previous days, but you are very welcome.

The objectives of this session following on from sessions with Sir Christopher Meyer last week and Sir David Manning yesterday is to continue building the Committee's understanding of the run-up to military action and the immediate post-war conflict phase.

We have heard the perspectives of senior UK officials in Washington and New York and Number 10 and today we will hear the views of the Foreign Office in London, and, in the days ahead, the views of the Ministry of Defence and the military.

This session will focus on developments of UK policy towards Iraq from the end of 2001 until the start of military action in March 2003 and the earlier months of the post-conflict phase.

As before, we are taking a broadly chronological approach starting towards the end of 2001, and we are aiming to pick up a number of overarching themes, depending on how much time we have and what emerges in the course of session.

1 I would like to recall, once again, that the Inquiry
2 has access to thousands of government papers, including 3 the most highly classified for the period we are looking 4 at. We are developing a picture of the policy debates 5 and the decision-making processes at the time, and these 6 oral evidence sessions are an important element in 7 informing the Inquiry's thinking and complementing
8 documentary evidence. It is important that witnesses 9 are open and frank while respecting national security.

10 I would like to remind witnesses, as I do on each 11 occasion, that they will later be asked to sign 12 a transcript of their evidence to the effect that the 13 evidence they have given is truthful, fair and accurate.

14 Perhaps we might begin by inviting Sir Peter and 15 Sir Edward to decide their role during the period in 16 question.

17 SIR PETER RICKETTS and MR EDWARD CHAPLIN

18 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. Yes, 19 I was the Foreign Office's Political Director for the 20 period from September 2001 through to July 2003 and, as 21 such, was in charge of the FCO's overall Iraq effort and 22 particularly took a close interest in the multilateral 23 negotiations, particularly in the UN.

24 THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Mr Chaplin.

25 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Thank you. In that period I was

1 ambassador in Amman, in fact, from May 2000
2 until April 2002, then I returned to London to take up
3 my job as Director for the Middle East and North Africa, 4 therefore the senior official working directly to Peter 5 in charge of the whole of Middle East policy, including 6 Iraq, although my responsibility ceased -- the 7 Directorate for Iraq ceased in September 2003.

8 THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you. Are there any preliminary points 9 either of you want to make before we get to the 10 questions?

11 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Can I just make a brief comment about 12 the provision of documents to the Inquiry? I said right 13 at the outset of this that we were one hundred per cent 14 committed to giving every support we could to the 15 Inquiry. I think the FCO has now provided more than 16 11,000 documents.

17 Sir Christopher Meyer in his evidence session last 18 week, pointed out, I think, five documents in the course
19 of his evidence that he had not been able to retrieve 20 from the archives. When I saw that, I immediately asked 21 what the position was. I gather that Sir Christopher 22 had asked about 48 hours before to see a number of 23 documents. We were able to find pretty rapidly four of 24 the five he referred to and they are being sent to the 25 Inquiry; the fifth, was, I think, a personal message to

1 Number 10, which will have to be retrieved from the 2 Cabinet Office archives. He also asked for a number of 3 others, most of which we have also located and are 4 sending to the Inquiry, with one or two still to be 5 chased down.

6 Most of these documents were only making a fleeting
7 reference to Iraq as part of a wider round-up of events, 8 such as an annual review, which is why they hadn't been 9 part of the initial trawl of documents sent to the 10 Inquiry, but I just wanted to reassure that the FCO's 11 retrieval of documents I think is proceeding effectively 12 and to reiterate again our absolute commitment to 13 finding any document that the Inquiry wishes to have.

14 THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Sir Peter. I think it is perhaps 15 worth remarking we have received a very large store of 16 government documents already from the whole array of 17 relevant departments, including the FCO. The flow 18 continues as new material emerges out of the questioning 19 or out of our search requirements.

20 Can I say, I, for my part, and I know my colleagues 21 are satisfied that the government is honouring its 22 promise to provide us full and complete access and there 23 isn't any holding back. If there were, we should kick 24 up a stink about it, but there isn't, as things go on.

25 Perhaps as a final word on this, if you put in more

1 than about three key search words you get the entirety
2 of a government department's archive. So there has to 3 be a process of selection and identification, which does 4 mean that the flow will continue probably throughout 5 most of the Inquiry's sittings.

6 With that, may we turn to the questioning,
7 Sir Martin?

8 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: My first question is from the 9 perspective of the Foreign Office, from your 10 perspective, when did it become apparent that the 11 United States was contemplating a more active approach 12 to regime change in Iraq than during the first years of 13 the Bush administration, during the first year?

14 SIR PETER RICKETTS: As I say, I think in my first evidence 15 session, it was part of the inherited policy of the US
16 that regime change in Iraq was a good thing, that it
17 became part of the Iraq Liberation Act of the Clinton 18 era. It was in Condoleezza Rice's article in foreign 19 affairs and it was referred to from time to time by the 20 President. So the concept of regime change was in the 21 bloodstream of the Republican administration.

22 You have heard from other witnesses that in the 23 immediate aftermath of 9/11 the issue of Iraq came up 24 with President Bush and others referring to Iraq and 25 questioning whether there was any link between Iraq and

1 the 9/11 attack. We did not have any information that 2 there was.

3 Looking back, I think the fact is there was 4 a process, evolution, from an aspiration immediately 5 after 9/11 to a settled determination through to 6 a policy to carry it out, and that process really 7 covered the whole period from September 2001 right 8 through to the summer of 2002.

9 I think there is a risk of putting, with the benefit 10 of hindsight, a pattern on events that they didn't seem 11 to have at the time. I don't feel that there was 12 a particular point, certainly any time between 9/11 and, 13 say, Crawford, where it was unmistakably clear that 14 there had been a change of US policy.

15 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Within the Foreign Office thinking, by 16 the spring of 2002, even with a possible tighter
17 sanctions regime, did containment have any real meaning 18 for you in terms of the disarmament of Iraq, as mandated 19 and reiterated by the UN over more than a decade?

20 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I don't think that the containment
21 policy that we were pursuing pre-9/11 was any longer fit 22 for purpose and the policy options papers that we put to 23 Ministers in March in advance of the Prime Minister's 24 visit to Crawford canvassed both what we called 25 "toughened" containment or an option which was

1 theoretical at that time, some form of intervention in 2 Iraq to achieve our weapons of mass destruction 3 objectives by another means.

4 By "toughened" containment we really meant a much 5 more intrusive, vigorous weapons inspection regime,
6 bearing in mind that, throughout this period, our policy
7 objective was the removal of Saddam's weapons of mass 8 destruction and not regime change.

9 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: You mentioned the run-up to Crawford.
10 I would like to ask you, Sir Peter, if you could 11 describe to us the advice which the Foreign Secretary
12 was receiving before the Prime Minister went to Crawford 13 with regard to the whole question of Iraq and how to 14 deal with Iraq, and, in this advice, how were the UK 15 objectives formulated and discussed?

16 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Certainly. The most considered 17 document that I recall was one produced by the 18 Cabinet Office but with input from the FCO and other 19 departments, I think dated 6 March, intended for the 20 Foreign Secretary and other Ministers, which was an 21 assessment of the position at that stage.

22 As I mentioned, it set out our objective, which 23 throughout was the removal of Saddam's weapons of mass 24 destruction. It proposed one way of doing that, which 25 was toughened containment and an intrusive inspection

1 regime through the UN. It canvassed other ways of 2 achieving that regime change through an uprising in 3 Iraq, through an air campaign or through a ground
4 campaign. It put up in lights officials' very serious
5 doubts that a legal base for any action of that kind 6 would exist at that stage, and it already began to 7 discuss issues of whether regime change would actually 8 lead to a better position, ie would it lead to 9 substituting Saddam Hussein for another Sunni strongman.

10 Now, that advice was to Ministers collectively. We 11 then had an office meeting with the Foreign Secretary 12 later in March, I think on the 18th, where we discussed 13 all that set of issues, as a result of which he put 14 a series of minutes to the Prime Minister in advance of 15 Crawford, including a very private and personal minute, 16 which subsequently leaked on the Internet in 2005, which 17 set out very clearly Jack Straw's thinking into which 18 I had been feeding that the objective of removing 19 Saddam's weapons of mass destruction was best pursued 20 through a UN inspection route. We already had that 21 route mapped out in our minds.

22 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Can we look briefly, one by one, at the 23 conditions that the United Kingdom was pressing on the 24 United States as essential if Britain were to join 25 a military mission against Saddam Hussein and the extent

1 to which they were being met?

2 First of all, how far was the government able to 3 convince public opinion, which was one of the 4 conditions, that a military option might be required?
5 How hard was this done? By what means?

6 SIR PETER RICKETTS: It was certainly a clear view among 7 Ministers. You heard from Sir David Manning yesterday 8 about the Prime Minister, but also Jack Straw, that, in 9 taking this policy forward, this policy which we 10 favoured at that time of strengthening a more intrusive
11 inspection regime targeted on the weapons of mass
12 destruction, that we needed to have a more informed 13 public debate about the threat from Saddam's weapons of 14 mass destruction and about the implications for regional 15 security of Iraq in its current position.

16 That was certainly a strand in ministerial thinking 17 throughout that period.

18 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: How do you account for the scepticism, 19 the general scepticism of the British public, that 20 Saddam constituted a serious danger to the region.

21 SIR PETER RICKETTS: We had spent the previous months 22 concentrating on the threat from Al-Qaeda in 23 Afghanistan. We had been through the military 24 intervention in Afghanistan and we were still, at that 25 stage, involved in the aftermath of that, an

1 international security force and the civilian effort in 2 Afghanistan. There was a lot of public attention on 3 Al-Qaeda and the threat from Afghanistan.

4 As we have discussed in previous evidence sessions, 5 we had, in Whitehall, been seriously concerned about the 6 threat from weapons of mass destruction and the risk 7 that they would be reconstituted as the sanctions regime
8 broke down and Saddam got access to more money, and it 9 had been a consistent worry.

10 9/11 and the evidence of terrorist interest in 11 weapons of mass destruction was a further boost. It was 12 a very strong strand in the Prime Minister's thinking 13 and the Foreign Secretary's thinking, but it hadn't been 14 a big feature of public presentation of the 15 counter-terrorism strategy. Therefore, as we focused 16 harder on Iraq, as that was clearly rising up the US 17 political agenda, it was important that we should get 18 out to the public more information about what we saw as 19 the threat from Saddam, Iraq's weapons of mass 20 destruction.

21 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Do you feel that was done effectively?

22 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I feel it was certainly a major 23 preoccupation of Ministers and it led on to a number of 24 developments for -- following on during the year, such 25 as the dossier produced in September 2002, which

1 I didn't myself have any great part in. But this was 2 a consequence of the ministerial wish to have more 3 information out on the public record.

4 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: If I could turn to you, Mr Chaplin,
5 with regard to another of the conditions, that Britain
6 could not, as it was put to the United States, really 7 involve itself in possible military action or support
8 for the United States, if there were not serious 9 development in the Middle East peace process.

10 To what extent were we warning the United States 11 about the danger of double standards if we were seen to 12 be taking more aggressive action towards Iraq, while at 13 the same time not intervening effectively or trying to 14 intervene effectively in the Arab/Israel dispute?

15 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think that's a good point.

16 To remind ourselves of the background at that time, 17 Iraq wasn't the only major issue in the Middle East that 18 was grabbing ministerial and, indeed, Prime Ministerial 19 attention. The peace process was in serious difficulty 20 and there were very strong -- as Director of the Middle 21 East and North Africa, we were daily recipients of 22 agonised messages from leaders in the Middle East about 23 precisely the point you have made about the double 24 standards: how is it you are concentrating so heavily on 25 Iraq, when actually what is really troubling us and what

1 is undermining moderate governments in this part of the 2 world is you, the West's, failure to do anything --

3 THE CHAIRMAN: Mr Chaplin, I'm sorry to break in. The 4 transcriber is having a bit of difficulty. Perhaps if 5 you put your mic a little closer.

6 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Shall I go back a bit?

7 THE CHAIRMAN: Yes, thank you.

8 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: As I said, the governments of the 9 Middle East were extremely concerned, much more 10 concerned, and this was very clear from my time in 11 Jordan, talking to the King, as I did quite often, about 12 his concerns in the region. Of course, Iraq was a major 13 concern, but not in the way we thought the major concern 14 to Jordan, because of Jordan's dependence on Iraq for 15 oil and for trade. What really concerned the King, like 16 most other leaders in the region, was the dire situation
17 in the Arab/Israel dispute since the Intifada had broken 18 out again in late 2000 and the apparent failure of the 19 American administration or anybody else to do anything 20 about it.

21 Of course, the double standards to which he referred 22 were very much in people's minds and something that 23 would haunt us right through into military action in 24 Iraq. We can come back to that later, if you like, but 25 I think it is fair to say the Prime Minister was

1 extremely seized of this and I think made repeated 2 efforts to persuade President Bush and the 3 US administration that this really had to be taken 4 seriously.

5 As you say, it was one of the -- always one of the 6 elements that came up in the discussion of, "If we had 7 to take military action, what are the circumstances that 8 we should seek to contrive at the time?" and one of 9 those was always very strongly in the Prime Minister's 10 mind, a serious effort on the Middle East process to 11 show that we were giving as much attention to that as we 12 were to Iraq.

13 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Were there obstacles which we had to 14 face with regard to that in connection with the 15 United States' view?

16 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I don't think so. The message was 17 received. The question is whether real action followed.
18 There were attempts by the US to at least mitigate some 19 of the worst events, things were happening in the 20 West Bank, Israeli action in the West Bank, the siege of 21 Ramallah and Yasser Arafat and so on. This was all 22 headlined day in and day out in the Middle East and was 23 doing serious damage.

24 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: How important in connection with this 25 link was the President's commitment to the road map

1 in June and what was our input to that?

2 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: We were all involved in feeding ideas 3 to -- for the road map, this plan that we hoped both 4 sides would sign up to and would take us through to 5 resume a path towards peace.

6 But, of course, the problem was getting both sides
7 in the right place, to actually produce the meaningful 8 commitments which would persuade the other side that the 9 concessions were worth making. So it was slow progress.
10 Indeed, I think the road map wasn't published until 11 rather later than we would have wanted.

12 SIR PETER RICKETTS: May I just interject one point on 13 context? We now look at Crawford as a key event in the 14 Iraq saga, but for those of us preparing at the time for 15 the Prime Minister's visit, the Arab/Israel issue was at 16 least as major a concern. It was a time when the 17 Israelis were occupying the West Bank and there was 18 military pressure on Jenin. The briefing for the 19 Prime Minister was at least as concerned with 20 Arab/Israel and I think his discussions with the 21 President were as much concerned with that as with Iraq.
22 It was an issue which he was passionately concerned 23 about and very, very active in pressing the President 24 on.

25 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: We will come later to the Arab capitals

1 in the later phase, but if I could move on just very 2 briefly, Sir Peter, to look at the third of the 3 conditions, which was the ability of the United Kingdom 4 to persuade the United States to go what was called the 5 UN route by means of a new Security Council Resolution, 6 the return of the inspectors.

7 My question is: how far did Saddam's past rejection
8 of this route, of the UN inspectors, of full disclosure, 9 weigh with us in terms of how realistic even a tough 10 resolution could be?

11 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Well, I think we had all along seen 12 effective weapons inspection as the best way of dealing 13 with the weapons of mass destruction problem, and, of 14 course, we had the experience of the 1990s, we had 15 UNSCOM being blocked and hindered and then the 16 withdrawal of UNSCOM. So we knew that if we were going 17 to have a serious weapons inspection regime, it had to, 18 first of all, have wide backing in the Security Council 19 and, secondly, have really effective, tough measures 20 requiring Saddam to cooperate. That's why we and the 21 Americans spent so long trying to assemble a unanimous 22 Security Council Resolution on some very, very demanding 23 measures, and, actually, looking back on 1441, it is 24 pretty extraordinary in terms of the intrusiveness and 25 the extent of the inspection regime which it imposed on

1 Iraq with the support of every member of the Council.

2 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Can I just add to that, because the 3 position -- as I said at the beginning, I was head of 4 the Middle East Department from late 1996 until late 5 1999, so I was quite closely involved, although at 6 a more junior level, in the whole saga of weapons
7 inspection, UNSCOM, the expulsion of weapons, inspectors
8 and military action in Desert Fox in 1998.

9 So when you say, "How heavily did this weigh?" it, 10 of course, weighed heavily, I think, on both sides of 11 the Atlantic, this track record, that Saddam Hussein 12 appeared to go to almost any lengths, including being 13 willing to suffer the consequences of military action 14 (inaudible) action, rather than cooperating with the 15 United Nations and the international community.

16 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: So could one say that from the start of 17 the post-Crawford UN route, which, as Sir Peter says, 18 was pursued with tremendous energy and effort, that 19 there was always the recognition that, however tough 20 a resolution might be, it might simply not be effective?

21 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think there was in our minds, but 22 there were some differences from 1998. We had 23 a different resolution base, 1284, which was still 24 there, unimplemented, but with the creation of a new 25 body, UNMOVIC, and UNMOVIC was designed, the source of

1 negotiation over the year that led up to the adoption of 2 1284 in late 1999, to reassure the Iraqis, amongst 3 others, that it was a neutral, independent body which 4 would do the right thing if only Iraq would do the right 5 thing.

6 So there was some hope, but in any case we all 7 recognised that the best way to resolve this was to 8 assemble enough pressure, including the threat of 9 military action, to get the inspectors back in and get 10 them working properly. At least that was my ...

11 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: During these negotiations where Britain
12 and the United States were in a way taking the lead -- 13 during this process, were there things, were there parts 14 of the negotiation which, if you like, flagged up 15 potential amber or even red flags with regard to the 16 attitude of the other principal powers involved?

17 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Yes, I think there were -- there was 18 suspicion on the part of some of the other members of 19 the P5 that our intention might be to set the bar so 20 high that Saddam could not possibly cross it and we were 21 extremely concerned, as Sir Jeremy Greenstock set out to 22 you, to make sure that we set a very tough but 23 achievable goal for Saddam Hussein.

24 Some of the ideas that circulated early on in the 25 resolution drafting phase probably were beyond that

1 point and would not have been possible for 2 Saddam Hussein to achieve, and the pressure of others in 3 the Permanent 5 and in the wider Security Council was 4 useful, I think, in bringing the resolution back to 5 a point where it was achievable, but very tough.

6 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Those that were reluctant to go that 7 route, those countries that were reluctant to go that 8 route, how was their reluctance overcome? What was the 9 argument that we were able to use?

10 SIR PETER RICKETTS: A classic process of negotiation, both 11 in the Security Council and in capitals, successive 12 discussions of drafts of resolutions, starting 13 in September soon after President Bush's speech to the 14 UN and all the way through to the adoption of the 15 resolution in early November. I mean, endless rounds of 16 negotiation on texts of resolutions.

17 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: So we had no problem with not setting 18 the bar too high?

19 SIR PETER RICKETTS: On the contrary, our intention was 20 always that it should be a resolution that was capable 21 of being implemented, and that the demand should be 22 tough but not one that was impossible for him to meet.

23 Actually, in the end, the key part of the resolution 24 that was the final subject of negotiation, as Sir Jeremy 25 set out, was not so much the intrusiveness of the

1 inspection regime because I think most people accepted 2 that, because of the past history, if we were going to 3 have an inspection regime it had to be a very intrusive 4 one, but the concern was automaticity or not, what 5 happened if Saddam did not comply?

6 I think, in the end, the Security Council was 7 convinced that it had to be, you know, a quite 8 exceptionally tough resolution.

9 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: I would like to turn to an issue of 10 intense interest and speculation and that is the 11 question of when Britain embarked on its own military 12 planning with regard to Iraq.

13 I wondered if you could tell us, Sir Peter, about 14 the small group of senior officials and military 15 planners established in late April 2002 by the 16 Ministry of Defence, just after the Crawford meeting, to 17 think about the issues that would be involved in any 18 military operation in Iraq as a basis for British 19 contingency planning. To what extent was the 20 Foreign Office involved in these military discussions 21 and what was the outcome of them?

22 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Well, the answer is yes, we were 23 involved from the outset. Of course, in addition, the 24 FCO had a seat at the chiefs of staffs table, so we were 25 always part of the chiefs of staff discussions week by

1 week throughout this period.

2 As you say, in addition, the MoD convened a small 3 group of officials in late April of 2002. I think 4 General Tony Pigott, who will be a witness with you 5 shortly, was the key MoD -- the key military general in 6 the position at the time and began to look at some of 7 the wider implications.

8 We didn't discuss military planning as such. We 9 discussed the implications of military planning for 10 other departments' activities, and the key initial work
11 that I was involved in was trying to define an end-state 12 for any military action we took. We had never supported 13 the idea simply of regime change, that was not our 14 proposal, but to say disarming Saddam of his weapons of 15 mass destruction was not adequate either, and so we 16 developed some ideas on what an end-state should be, the 17 sort of Iraq that we would want to see, law-abiding, 18 sovereign, with territorial integrity, not posing 19 a threat to its neighbours, respecting its obligations 20 on weapons of mass destruction and so on.

21 We worked up in that group an end-state which was 22 one of the political implications of any military plan.

23 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Was this end-state formulation made 24 public at the time?

25 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Not, not at the time but it informed

1 the debates that continued through the summer. I saw it
2 turning up in Cabinet Office documents in July, setting 3 out a rather more advanced phase of our planning, and 4 then I think it fed in through to the military plans 5 because military plans tend to start with what is the 6 objective that you are seeking to achieve. So it became 7 embedded in our planning exercise.

8 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: The end-state was essentially 9 a law-abiding Iraq within its existing borders, 10 cooperating with the international community and no 11 longer posing a threat?

12 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Yes.

13 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Was this something which could also be 14 achieved through 1441, through the UN route, or did it 15 really depend upon regime change, a drastic change?

16 SIR PETER RICKETTS: It is hard to imagine that an Iraq of 17 that kind was possible with Saddam Hussein in charge, 18 and if -- because the presumption of this work was that 19 in due course there would be a military operation. If 20 one had a military operation and was seeking an 21 end-state like that, it is quite hard to imagine that 22 you would still have Saddam Hussein in charge at the end 23 of it. So it was not an objective, but it was very 24 likely to be a consequence.

25 I do think that it was always possible throughout

1 this exercise that Saddam Hussein could have chosen to 2 cooperate and we could have achieved the objectives of 3 1441 without a military campaign, but if we got into 4 a military campaign, I think it is hard to imagine the 5 conclusion of that without the disappearance of 6 Saddam Hussein.

7 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Could I add one point? There was also 8 the possibility, perhaps you have touched on already, 9 that under pressure, including military pressure,
10 build-up, Saddam Hussein would be persuaded by other 11 Arab heads of government to step down and go into exile; 12 in other words, we would achieve a change in the 13 regime's policies without military action.

14 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: When the military planning began, how 15 far was it impeded by the need not to give the public 16 the impression that military action was indeed under 17 contemplation and in due course in preparation?

18 SIR PETER RICKETTS: It wasn't impeded at the sort of level 19 we were doing it because we were doing it in 20 a confidential way. We were preparing contingency 21 advice, because clearly no decision had been taken on 22 any military operation and that was in parallel with the 23 contingency work that the chiefs of staff and the 24 military planners were doing on possible UK 25 contributions.

1 I think Sir David Manning set out to you the key 2 points in that.

3 Just moving forward a stage, it only really became 4 an issue when it would have been necessary to make 5 certain public steps in preparation. There we come much 6 further forward to October/November of 2002, where, for 7 example, embarking on call-up of reservists would have 8 sent very powerful public signals.

9 We, in the FCO, were working closely with the MoD
10 then to make sure that that was orchestrated so that it 11 helped the pressure to achieve 1441 and didn't cut 12 across that pressure, but that's coming at a later stage 13 in the story.

14 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: How far did the British participation
15 in military planning -- including, for example, 16 Major General Wilson, who was with Central Command in 17 Florida, and whom we will be seeing later this week --
18 add to the United States' perceptions that participation 19 in military action was all but inevitable.

20 SIR PETER RICKETTS: It is hard to answer that without being 21 from the United States, but from the records that I saw, 22 the Prime Minister and David Manning and the Foreign 23 Secretary could not have been clearer with the 24 United States, throughout the period from Crawford 25 onwards, that if the UK were to be part of some eventual

1 military operation, not at that time decided, then it
2 would be essential that we exhausted every option short 3 of that, most particularly through the UN. That could 4 not have been clearer.

5 So I know that Sir Christopher Meyer was told at 6 various points by US interlocutors that our "yes" was 7 heard louder than our "but", but nonetheless, I think 8 the "but" was extremely clear, that this was working 9 with the Americans on preparations and plans and 10 contingencies, but all subject to a very clear 11 ministerial position that we were determined to exhaust 12 UN avenues in the first place.

13 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: I understand that the UN avenue was 14 very much a caveat. Nevertheless, those that were 15 involved in the military plan, those in the 16 Foreign Office who were involved with it, was there not 17 somewhere a presumption that, in due course, there would 18 have to be a military operation, that with all the UN 19 route and the sanctions and the inspectors and Saddam, 20 that the presumption was actually, "We are going to go 21 to war"?

22 SIR PETER RICKETTS: That was not my presumption, no. My 23 presumption was that we were now in a phase of diplomacy
24 backed by the threat of force. It had been containment
25 up to 9/11. By the summer of 2002, it was diplomacy

1 backed by the threat of force and the threat of force 2 became more and more obvious as the autumn went on.

3 But I was conscious of two things. First of all,
4 I was absolutely sure that it would not be possible for 5 British forces to join military operations without the 6 agreement of the law officers, the CDS would require the 7 Attorney General to make clear that he was giving 8 a lawful order in ordering our troops into military 9 operations. So that was an absolute requirement, and, 10 also, that the UN route offered Saddam Hussein the 11 opportunity to comply.

12 All along, right through to the eve of the second 13 resolution, I thought it was possible, perhaps not 14 likely, but possible, that Saddam Hussein would choose, 15 rather than face overwhelming military force, to 16 cooperate and comply. So it was never for sure that the 17 UK would be part of military operations or even really 18 that military operations were inevitable. I always 19 thought there was another option.

20 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Could I just add to that from my 21 perspective?

22 On your first point, I think at every level, 23 including mine, the point was always on the line to the 24 Americans that although we might be talking about 25 contingency planning, which was an essential thing to

1 do, no decision had been taken and no decision would be 2 taken until much later, and that, as Sir Peter has 3 pointed out, there were various conditions for our 4 participation in military action, should it come to 5 that.

6 Secondly, I think it is fair to say that there was 7 a surge of hope after 1441. 1441 was quite a remarkable 8 achievement and if the Security Council could once more 9 come together, as it had before, and we could see 10 a track record going way back into the 90s, that, when 11 the Security Council were united, Saddam Hussein took 12 notice, as indeed he did on this occasion by letting the 13 inspectors back in, that there might, after all, be 14 a route to resolving this problem through the inspection 15 route and without military action.

16 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: I would like to ask you about your 17 particular bailiwick with regard to the preparations of 18 military action with all these caveats of course.

19 What was being done in the wider Middle East context
20 to prepare countries like Egypt and Jordan, 21 Saudi Arabia, to accept the possibility that there might 22 be military action in the event of the UN route failing?

23 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I don't think it was quite like that.
24 Obviously there were very frequent conversations with 25 leaders in the Arab world, particularly those likely to

1 be most affected. I already mentioned conversations
2 I had when I was ambassador in Jordan. There were real 3 fears about the impact of military action in Iraq 4 articulated very clearly by the King of Jordan and 5 others, the Crown Prince of Saudi Arabia.

6 In terms of the impact it would have on the 7 stability of the Middle East, and the impact it would 8 have on the peace process -- the double standards I have 9 indicated -- and, indeed, the impact it would have on 10 the wider campaign against terrorism post-9/11. So they 11 were flagging those up.

12 What we were doing was the messages we were passing 13 to all these governments, particularly those with any 14 influence in Baghdad, was, "We hear all that and we can 15 see it very clearly, as clearly as you can, but this is 16 a very serious problem and it has to be resolved. We 17 have been at this for 11/12 years, we cannot go on, 18 particularly after 9/11, without resolving this threat".

19 Therefore, our hope was that they would add their 20 own actions and pressure through private or public 21 means, to persuade the Iraqi regime to start cooperating 22 seriously with the UN, and we assured them that, if they 23 did that, then, you know, we would react accordingly.
24 We were not looking for an excuse to take military 25 action, far from it. We did want this problem resolved,

1 and that was as much, we thought, in their interest as 2 ours.

3 Of course, their perception of the threat, the WMD
4 threat, was not as serious as ours, with the one 5 exception perhaps of Iran, the neighbour that had 6 suffered quite severely from the actual use of WMD, 7 I have to say.

8 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: This dialogue continued right up to the 9 failure of the second resolution?

10 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Absolutely, yes, not least because there 11 was this idea, put forward by the Saudis, of the 12 possibility of persuading Saddam Hussein to step down if 13 enough time could be found after a final, final 14 ultimatum had been signed.

15 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: How serious was that initiative?

16 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think it was a serious idea, but 17 I don't think I ever saw much evidence that it was being 18 seriously followed up. Indeed -- well, perhaps it would 19 be fair to say that we didn't meet the conditions that 20 the Saudis and others thought were necessary, which was 21 really in their minds, I think, a second resolution and 22 then a gap of some weeks to allow Saddam Hussein to 23 comply or not comply. The hope was that in that period 24 he would step down and go into exile.

25 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: That, in a way, is another example of

1 why the failure to obtain a second resolution really 2 affected the outcome and there was an alternative 3 outcome that was not war.

4 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Yes, although within the Foreign Office,
5 at least, one of the reasons we were pressing very hard 6 for a second resolution -- and perhaps we will come on 7 to this -- was to create a greater sense of legitimacy
8 for the whole operation which was going to be crucial 9 for the handling of the aftermath.

10 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Right. You have mentioned the 11 aftermath and I would like to ask Sir Peter, as early 12 as July 2002, the Foreign Office was asking about what 13 serious work the United States administration was doing 14 to hold Iraq together after Saddam's regime had been 15 overthrown.

16 Can you tell us what Britain's main concerns were at 17 that time, in the summer of 2002, with regard to 18 a future Iraqi leader, to the Kurds, to the Shias and 19 the need for a United States-led administration?

20 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Yes, with the proviso that it was not 21 clear to anyone, I think, in the summer of 2002 that 22 that was the inevitable destination, that we would have 23 a military operation and a new regime in Iraq and then 24 a post-conflict period, but we did indeed, from -- 25 really from Crawford onwards, think in London and begin

1 to talk to the Americans about that.

2 I mentioned in our thinking about an end-state. We 3 were clear about the importance of territorial integrity
4 for Iraq, that we did not want to see Iraq come apart 5 with an independent Kurdish state being formed. We were 6 concerned that Iraq should evolve in the direction of 7 a stable neighbour in the region and not posing a threat
8 to its neighbours, and we were clear that the preferred 9 course, if it should come to a war and then 10 a post-conflict period, should be a UN-led 11 administration.

12 In Kosovo, we had had a UN-led transitional 13 administration, building on existing structures there.
14 In Afghanistan, we had had a very strong UN presence led 15 by Mr Brahimi, supporting a Loya Jurga, and then 16 a domestic process, and so we approached it in the same 17 frame of mind, that the UN had real experience in 18 dealing with post-conflict situations, a unique 19 legitimacy in doing so and that was our preferred route.

20 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: How did the United States respond to 21 that?

22 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I don't think in the summer of 2002 -- 23 and subject to correction from Mr Chaplin -- they were 24 putting a great deal of thought into the aftermath 25 period. I think that only really picked up steam in the

1 autumn, when our own discussions with them began to 2 intensify. In fact, Mr Chaplin was very much leading 3 that work. But it wasn't until the autumn, I think I'm 4 right in saying, that we started to really engage the 5 Americans in a serious discussions of this.

6 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: It was in this earlier period that we 7 really were applying our thought to what the aftermath 8 situation would be and, as you say, the extent to which 9 the end-state would apply?

10 SIR PETER RICKETTS: We were indeed, because we had always 11 been concerned from early on in talking about the 12 possibility of regime change that regime change itself
13 is a wholly inadequate concept, because if it changes 14 and the regime that follows is equally bad, you have 15 achieved nothing.

16 So the only point of going through all this is to 17 come out with a position which is better for the people 18 of Iraq, better for the region and better for 19 international security. So we were thinking from an 20 early stage, yes.

21 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: In August 2002, very much to the 22 concern of the British Government, the newspapers here 23 were reporting a serious rift between the American 24 embassies on regime change, on the removal of Saddam by 25 force and on our emphasis on Iraq's weapons of mass

1 destruction and going by UN Resolutions, the UN route.

2 How serious was this disagreement and how did it 3 show itself in the meetings between our respective 4 officials?

5 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I think it was not so much
6 a disagreement between the UK and US governments, but it
7 was more that US public opinion, US press and commentary 8 began to assume that war was inevitable and on a short 9 timetable and was well ahead of where the 10 US administration were.

11 As you heard from Sir David Manning, at the end
12 of August, the President himself and Condoleezza Rice 13 were assuring the Prime Minister and Sir David that 14 there were no firm plans and that the decision to go to 15 the UN was already taken. Of course, we were very 16 concerned. Indeed, the Foreign Secretary, Jack Straw, 17 went in the middle of August for a long and detailed 18 discussion with Colin Powell about precisely this, in 19 which the Foreign Secretary set out very forcefully and 20 eloquently the case that the Prime Minister then made at 21 Camp David a few days later for the return to the UN, 22 which the President then announced in the September.

23 So we were certainly redoubling our consultations
24 with the US administration, but, as I say, I think it 25 was, if anything, more a gap between where US

1 decision-making was and US public opinion was than a gap
2 between the US and UK governments.

3 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: How serious was the feeling that those 4 in Washington urging the abandonment of the UN route 5 might get the upper hand?

6 For example, Sir Jeremy Greenstock told us last week
7 that he had actually said he would have personal 8 difficulties in continuing with the UN if that element 9 of Washington thinking were to continue.

10 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Yes, we were seriously concerned, yes, 11 because we had all along attached the highest importance 12 to the United Nations and the weapons inspectors.

13 Sitting in London, I was clear that if there was to 14 be a rapid move to military action without a final 15 opportunity for Saddam Hussein to comply, I didn't see 16 how we could be part of that.

17 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: This was conveyed very forcefully, 18 I take it, at every level?

19 SIR PETER RICKETTS: It was indeed, and it was very much 20 part of the reason for the Foreign Secretary 21 exceptionally going to Washington in the middle 22 of August to see Colin Powell.

23 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Mr Chaplin, I would like to ask you
24 about a very important cross-Whitehall mission that you 25 headed in Washington in early November 2002, which

1 dealt, I believe with the role that the UN were playing 2 in the transition in Iraq after the end of the Saddam
3 regime from military to civilian rule and to UN rule.

4 How did your mission proceed and what were the sort 5 of arguments and debates?

6 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Well, in fact, I was in Washington 7 several times. I think I was there in June, although 8 not specifically on that subject. I was certainly there 9 in November and in 2002, and in January 2003, leading 10 a cross-Whitehall team. We also included the 11 Australians, because the Australians had relevant recent 12 experience from East Timor of the sort of model that we 13 thought the Americans should follow.

14 The main objective was indeed to persuade them that 15 the UN should have a key role as soon as the fighting 16 had stopped, if it came to that. Of course, all of this 17 was on the caveat that this is not what we wanted, but 18 we needed to plan sensibly, and we, I suppose, 19 underlined, in particular, the legitimacy point, which 20 we have already discussed, but also the practicalities 21 of the burden sharing in terms of the skills of the 22 people you would need to administer a shattered economy, 23 a shattered society, after an invasion, and could not 24 easily be found just within our own resources. The UN 25 had a lot of experience in this sort of affair, Kosovo,

1 East Timor and so on, and were well used to doing it,
2 and they could be there for the long haul. This was 3 obviously going to take years to -- they were going to 4 need years of support and help in Iraq.

5 The burden sharing also in the sense of the 6 financing, that the Americans were determined to do it 7 on their own, they were going to end up with a bill for 8 the whole lot, and the political responsibility for it 9 going right. It seemed to us obvious that they should 10 go the UN route.

11 I have to say our arguments, certainly at my level, 12 didn't have much impact. There was no problem 13 convincing the State Department. Throughout this period 14 I had a lot of contact with -- my opposite member was 15 Bill Burns, and we had both been ambassadors in Amman 16 together, so we knew each other quite well. There was 17 no problem convincing the State Department that this was 18 the right way to go, and indeed that applied to a whole 19 lot of post-war planning.

20 The problem was elsewhere in Washington, as has 21 already been described by Sir Christopher Meyer, and it
22 was a real US blind spot. I think they had a touching 23 faith that, once Iraq had been liberated from the 24 terrible tyranny of Saddam Hussein, everyone would be 25 grateful and dancing in the streets and there would

1 really be no further difficulty and the Iraqis would 2 somehow magically take over and restore their state to 3 the democratic state that it should be in.

4 We tried to point out that that was extremely 5 optimistic. I think one of the problems that the 6 Americans had this view was that they relied heavily on 7 what they were hearing from different opposition groups, 8 and these were the opposition groups outside Iraq. We 9 were always a great deal more sceptical about what they 10 were saying and what they were claiming would happen in 11 the aftermath of an invasion, but I think some Americans 12 were hearing some very happy talk from the likes of 13 Mr Chalabi that, once Saddam Hussein had gone, they 14 didn't need to worry, everything would be fine, the 15 subtext being particularly if they handed over power to 16 someone like Mr Chalabi.

17 We were always very firmly of the view and expressed 18 this to everyone including the Americans, but also in 19 the region, that we held no particular candle for any 20 opposition, any exiled group. We had a view that they 21 carried actually very little credibility where it
22 mattered in Iraq. Of course, they had their own point 23 of view and they would have to test that where it 24 mattered back in Iraq when we got to that point or 25 stage.

1 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: These discussions are taking place in 2 November and they are predicated upon a future Iraq
3 without Saddam and we are pushing for the UN group
4 there, the UN contribution there.

5 How much, in your mind, when you were in those 6 discussions in Washington, was there a feeling that the 7 UN route towards Saddam's disarmament, was not going to 8 work, that somehow this was urgent because there would, 9 or could, inevitably be a military operation?

10 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think I talked before about the surge 11 of hope after 1441. So I think we still had hopes, 12 certainly on the UK side, that the UN route would 13 produce the result that we wanted without military 14 action.

15 I mean, we did get some traction. By January 2003, 16 though, as it turned out, that was rather late in the 17 day, though we hoped we would have more time, the 18 Americans were at least listening. We produced a raft
19 of papers that you have probably seen by the Iraq Policy
20 Unit which was in operation by then. So we bombarded 21 the Americans with lots of good advice, we hoped, on the 22 handling of the aftermath and said it needed to be 23 considered, which actually matched pretty well with what 24 the State Department had done. They had something 25 called the Future of Iraq Project. They had got

1 together lots of Iraqis, academics and so on, producing 2 very detailed assessments of what would need to be done
3 to rebuild Iraq.

4 But I think there was -- probably difficult to 5 overestimate the degree of scepticism, not to say 6 outright hostility towards the UN from some quarters of 7 the US administration. They really didn't want to hand 8 things over to the UN. They just thought that was 9 against US interests and against the interests of Iraq.

10 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: In regard to our planning, thinking 11 about the post-Saddam Iraq, you were present at the 12 Prime Minister's seminar in Downing Street --

13 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Yes.

14 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: -- on 19 November 2002 --

15 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: At this moment, can I just say for 16 the sake of transparency, this was a seminar that took 17 place at my instigation because I was aware of 18 misgivings amongst some specialists in Iraq, about the 19 direction of policy and it involved Toby Dodge, 20 Charles Tripp, Steve Simon, Michael Clark and 21 George Joffe, as well as myself.

22 I should also state that that was my only direct 23 engagement in Iraq policy-making.

24 THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you.

25 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: I have studied as carefully as I can

1 the discussion about -- among the academics, their 2 input, and my question is, as a result of this 3 particular meeting, with its rather serious array of 4 possible options for post-Saddam Iraq, did this generate 5 further thinking within the Foreign Office and any 6 evolution of thinking?

7 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Yes, it did. It was a useful meeting
8 and I felt useful to expose the Prime Minister to some 9 of the likely problems after an invasion. I mean, there 10 is -- there had been a difficulty for everybody making 11 sense of what was going on inside Iraq. Of course, we 12 had no embassy there. We had a watching brief from 13 Amman, including diplomats from the embassy in Amman
14 going in to Iraq from time to time as the situation 15 permitted, but our information was certainly patchy. So 16 it was very useful to have the input from those 17 specialists who had studied it in depth as to the sort 18 of problems that -- particularly the state of Iraqi 19 society, what shape it was likely to be in after long 20 years of Saddam Hussein and sanctions and so on.

21 That certainly fed into the work being done by 22 Dominic Chilcott, whom I think you are seeing later, as 23 head of the Iraq Policy Unit, and into the papers that 24 we were preparing, and, therefore, into the stuff that 25 we were giving the Americans.

1 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: One last question on this because 2 Baroness Prashar will be taking up the topic of the post
3 conflict Iraq planning, indeed what was done.

4 Did a point come in February/early March, when the 5 post-Iraq planning became more intense because it seemed 6 clear that the UN route was not going to work?

7 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: It was already pretty intense from late 8 2002, as far as we were concerned. Yes, it did 9 become -- it became sort of more real as we realised 10 that a time was likely to be short. I mean, I have to 11 say that, after the passage of 1441, apart from the 12 surge of hope that we might solve this through the UN 13 route, there was also a surge of hope, certainly on my 14 part, that this would give us more time.

15 Indeed, some exchanges I had with my opposite number 16 in Washington suggested that, despite all the 17 difficulties of military forces that had gone to the 18 region having to wait, it was not impossible to think 19 that one could delay things until the autumn of 2003, 20 and that would have been a very good thing, not least 21 because we were given extra time for the planning that 22 was necessary. I suppose what I observed, to come back 23 to your question, in Washington was something of 24 a scramble of planning with the setting up of ORHA, 25 which I suspect we are going to come to in a bit more

1 detail.

2 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Thank you very much.

3 Sir Peter, I want to move on to, if you like, the 4 final steps towards the military conflict, and 5 I wondered, first of all, how important were the 6 apparent weaknesses in Iraq's 12,000-page declaration 7 of December 7th in creating a sense that Iraq was 8 already in breach of Resolution 1441 and that the 9 inspectors were unlikely to be satisfied with their 10 ongoing quest that had only just begun?

11 I see a lot of discussion about this, particularly 12 between Britain and the United States, and I wondered 13 what your reflections were on that.

14 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I think the impact in Washington of the 15 incomplete declaration was very strong because it tended 16 to confirm the sceptics who thought that Iraq -- Saddam 17 was most unlikely to comply with the resolution.

18 Our response in London to that was to say, "Hold on, 19 operational paragraph 4 of the 1441 provided that 20 a further material breach was both an inadequate 21 declaration and a failure to comply", and we absolutely 22 did not give up hope that, despite an inadequate 23 declaration, we could, by effective inspection and good 24 intelligence to the inspectors, perseverance, show 25 progress in the inspection.

1 We worked on that through December and January
2 and February. As others have said, of course, good 3 detective work was not enough. I mean, the test in the 4 resolution was full cooperation and we were looking for 5 signs of full cooperation, and, as January/February wore 6 on, it became increasingly clear we were not getting 7 that, but I think the impact of the incomplete 8 declaration was greater in Washington than it was in 9 London.

10 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Then with the three successive reports
11 by Hans Blix and the inspectors, was that pattern
12 repeated or did Britain find itself becoming more 13 convinced that this wasn't the full cooperation that was 14 required?

15 SIR PETER RICKETTS: We were getting increasingly worried
16 that it wasn't and Hans Blix' report of 27 January 17 suggested that UNMOVIC as well were concerned at the 18 level of cooperation. We had had a number of finds on 19 the basis of intelligence, as other witnesses have 20 described to you. We then had a rather different term 21 from Mr Blix in his early February report. So it was up 22 and down at that period, but, yes, the trend, I think, 23 was towards growing concern and anxiety that we were not 24 at least getting full cooperation as provided in the US 25 resolution.

1 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: At what point were we able to make some 2 assessments as to what timeframe Saddam should be 3 allowed within which to comply?

4 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Well, in January we found that the US 5 tempo was accelerating again towards military action and 6 we made a major effort from the Prime Minister 7 downwards, but including myself and others, and frequent 8 visits to and discussions with Washington, to make the 9 case again for more time. That developed into the idea 10 of a second resolution and then into the six tests, all 11 of which really were further efforts to give 12 Saddam Hussein a further opportunity to demonstrate full 13 cooperation after the shaky start that he had made.

14 I don't think we ever said six month or four months 15 or three months are essential, but we were certainly 16 feeling in January that more time was needed.

17 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Then, with the failure of the second 18 resolution, this really threw everything into confusion.

19 Was there a point at which one could argue that the 20 steady build-up of troops which was taking place as 21 a spur to Saddam's compliance, that at a certain point 22 it became the inevitability of military action by those 23 troops?

24 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Yes, I think that's fair, and other 25 witnesses have described to you the difficulty of trying

1 to ride the two horses of the political timetable, of 2 allowing enough time for a genuine conclusion that the 3 inspections had not produced full cooperation and the 4 military build-up, and I felt myself one of those who 5 was at the centre of that tension.

6 We were, as you say, trying our best to use the 7 build-up as leverage on Saddam Hussein to see at last, 8 at the 11th hour and 59th minute, that full cooperation 9 was a better course than the alternative.

10 With the failure of the second resolution, when it 11 became clear that we did not have nine votes, indeed we 12 would get vetos, I think we finally lost traction for 13 the political process and then it became a question of 14 the military timetable, but right up until that point we 15 were still trying to use the leverage that that 16 provided.

17 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Right. Was there any discussion among 18 Ministers and officials as to whether, after the failure 19 of the second resolution, there might still be the 20 possibility of some form of Security Council consensus 21 with France that would be more likely if inspectors were 22 given more time?

23 SIR PETER RICKETTS: There were constant discussions, daily, 24 hourly discussions between the Prime Minister and the 25 Foreign Secretary and officials about our tactical

1 options, but I think with the conclusion that we would 2 not get a second resolution the effective opportunity of 3 further time for further inspections ran out because we 4 did not have a good counter to the argument that 5 Saddam Hussein had been given an opportunity to show
6 full cooperation and, after four months, was not showing 7 it, and that, absent a second resolution, there was no 8 reason to think that a further one or two or three 9 months would reverse that process.

10 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Were they putting that argument to 11 those that were proposing -- say, the Canadians and 12 others -- that there should be a greater time limit, for 13 example, a 45-day extension, if you like, of the 14 compliance?

15 SIR PETER RICKETTS: My recollection of that period is that 16 we saw the only real remaining hope, given the growing 17 evidence that there was not full cooperation, was 18 a further tightening of the pressure through a second 19 resolution with an ultimatum. But an ultimatum without 20 a second resolution, a simple extension of time at that 21 point seemed to us to be unlikely to achieve anything.

22 I don't know whether Mr Chaplin has a more detailed 23 remembrance.

24 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Just to add an observation really.

25 I think the papers you have seen show you that ideas

1 were being put up right until the last minute, including 2 after it seemed clear that a second resolution wasn't 3 going to happen, for example, after the President had 4 made clear that he would (inaudible) veto any such 5 resolution. Nevertheless, ideas were going up about how 6 to devise an ultimatum which could show beyond 7 reasonable doubt that we had exhausted every possible 8 peaceful option. I think the 45-day option referred to 9 came from the six more neutral members of the Security 10 Council.

11 But my observation really is to underline, I mean, 12 why did the political track run out at this stage. Why 13 wasn't there scope to extend it further? I think there 14 was -- and this was very clear, I think -- a fundamental 15 lack of trust at the heart of the Security Council 16 amongst the Permanent 5, and in particular between the 17 United States and France, and I think it boiled down to 18 the fact that the United States could not -- did not 19 believe that there were any circumstances in which the 20 French would join military action, whatever happened, 21 however much time we gave the inspectors, whatever 22 Saddam Hussein did.

23 There was some evidence for that, although, at my 24 level, my French opposite numbers waxed indignant that 25 they had ruled out military action, they just didn't

1 have the same view of the threat as we did, they would 2 claim. But there was that disbelief on the US part, and 3 on the French part there was disbelief that there were 4 any circumstances in which the United States would agree 5 to a peaceful exit from this, that they were going to 6 get Saddam and they were just using this UN process as 7 an excuse. We were in the, actually, not unusual 8 position of trying to bridge that gap, and in the end we 9 couldn't and that's why the political road ran out.

10 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Was there no way that Britain could 11 have taken an independent stance on this? For example, 12 Sir Jeremy Greenstock had proposed a seven-day 13 ultimatum, and yet, this somehow didn't get any 14 traction, I take it, with the United States. Could it 15 have been negotiated?

16 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Sir Peter was there, but I think the 17 seven days, which was a very short period, was imposed 18 by the Americans.

19 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I think after four months, the idea
20 that a few more days was going to make much difference 21 didn't have much credibility. At this point you come 22 back to what Sir David Manning was telling you yesterday 23 about the Prime Minister's fundamental conviction that,
24 having exhausted the UN route -- and I think he judged
25 that by now the UN route was exhausted -- his commitment

1 was to be with the United States in supporting the 2 United States in this effort to combat Saddam Hussein
3 and his weapons of mass destruction.

4 So at that point, I think, that sense of commitment 5 and his own commitment to the goal of removing WMD by 6 military force, if it was not possible by the UN, became 7 the dominant force of the policy.

8 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: So that commitment essentially meant 9 that those who felt there had been or should be more 10 time for Saddam, however limited, really had no say, no 11 input?

12 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Everybody had an input and there had 13 been absolutely strenuous efforts and ingenuity
14 exercised by all concerned to think of new ways and yet 15 new ways of giving Saddam Hussein yet another 16 opportunity to show full cooperation, but I think around 17 the time that the second resolution clearly was not 18 going to pass, I think that Ministers conclude that had 19 the UN route was to all intents and purposes exhausted.

20 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: My final question relates to the 21 48-hour ultimatum to Saddam that he and his son should 22 leave Iraq or face war. To what extent was that an 23 Anglo-American ultimatum and an Anglo-American decision?

24 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I do not have a clear memory of that, 25 I am afraid. I'd have to do further research on that.

1 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: No, nor do I, and I haven't actually 2 seen any sort of documentary evidence that lay behind 3 that ultimatum, but I think it picked up on the idea we 4 mentioned earlier, that there was an idea coming out of 5 the region that, at the last gasp, a chance should be 6 given to resolve this peaceably by the route of 7 Saddam Hussein going into exile or stepping down and 8 handing over to somebody else.

9 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: So could that ultimatum have activated 10 in a way what you were saying earlier, the suggestions
11 by various governments, such as the Saudi Arabian
12 Government, that Saddam would go into exile or there 13 would be some peaceful removal of Saddam?

14 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think if somebody had produced 15 a credible proposal and had proved that Saddam Hussein 16 was serious about accepting it, then of course we would 17 have paused, but that didn't happen.

18 SIR MARTIN GILBERT: Thank you very much.

19 THE CHAIRMAN: I think we are coming fairly close to having 20 a break, but before we do, and before Baroness Prashar 21 takes up the questioning after the break, I will just 22 ask my colleagues if they would like to follow up.

23 Sir Roderic?

24 SIR RODERIC LYNE: Sir Peter, you have talked of the options 25 paper that was drawn up in the Cabinet Office in

1 March of 2002 and said that the Foreign Secretary had 2 put minutes to the Prime Minister, including one that 3 had subsequently leaked, about the paper before the 4 Prime Minister went to Crawford.

5 Can you remember whether this paper was discussed
6 collectively by Ministers, by Cabinet Ministers, before
7 the Prime Minister went to Crawford, and can you recall 8 what decisions Ministers took on the options that were 9 presented to them in the paper?

10 SIR PETER RICKETTS: My memory is the same as 11 Sir David Manning's, as he explained to you yesterday, 12 that there was no particular decision point before 13 Crawford from which a new policy emerged. I remember 14 more a process of feeding in advice to the 15 Prime Minister in preparation for Crawford.

16 I can't tell you whether there was a meeting of 17 Ministers. It was not one that I was present at. The 18 Cabinet Office paper was certainly a comprehensive paper
19 that was put up to Ministers, all the relevant Ministers
20 at the same time and I know that the Foreign Secretary 21 had a number of bilateral conversations with the 22 Prime Minister in the run-up to Crawford. I'm not aware 23 of any collective sort of Cabinet ministerial 24 discussion.

25 SIR RODERIC LYNE: We have all read the paper. It is an

1 impressive piece of work. It is what you would probably 2 call a classic Civil Service piece of drafting. It is 3 very comprehensive.

4 Are you saying, in effect, that this paper, having 5 been put up to the Prime Minister and other Cabinet
6 Ministers, there were no decisions on it, that then 7 there was a vacuum thereafter?

8 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I'm not saying there was a vacuum. I'm 9 saying it did not seek decisions, it did not put options
10 for Ministers to decide. Actually, there were no 11 decisions to take at that time, because, as Sir David 12 explained to you yesterday, the purpose of the 13 Prime Minister's visit to Crawford was to sound out 14 where President Bush was, to compare notes with him and 15 then to come back and to set work in hand, which is what 16 happened.

17 The Prime Minister came back and set work in hand 18 which led on then to the work in Whitehall which we have 19 talked about, the private meetings on implications of 20 potential military action and so on.

21 So it wasn't a decision-making point and, as I have 22 said in earlier evidence, actually the most operational 23 issue on the agenda at Crawford was the crisis between 24 Israel and Palestine and the --

25 SIR RODERIC LYNE: I will come on to that in a minute.

1 I simply observe that Sir Christopher Meyer has argued 2 that our policy did change in this period, that he 3 received -- and he put this in print in his book -- 4 instructions of a different kind, taking his cue from 5 a Sir David Manning coming out a few days after the 6 options paper was drafted, and, when you look at the 7 paper and you compare it with what he said, it would 8 appear that the paper had been part of a process of 9 shifting policy.

10 If I can now turn to the Middle East peace process 11 and just ask Mr Chaplin, you said that you were 12 disappointed that the Americans moved so slowly on the 13 road map, that it was published so late in the day. Why 14 was the American administration so reluctant to move 15 forward with the road map and to what extent might this 16 have been due to pressure from Israel on the 17 administration?

18 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think this, as you know, is a very 19 long saga and the US administrations have always 20 struggled to find a way through. Perhaps it is fair to 21 say that they had many other preoccupations,
22 particularly after September 2001, and they were subject 23 to pressure from Israel and Israel's friends in the 24 United States. So it wasn't exactly a surprise. It was 25 a disappointment, not least because what to us was the

1 compelling case for ensuring that there was some visible 2 progress, some visible improvement at least of the 3 situation in the occupied territories, in order to 4 provide a better backdrop for what we were trying to do 5 with Iraq.

6 SIR RODERIC LYNE: We were setting this as a very important 7 condition really, a very important part of our position
8 that there should be movement on the Middle East process 9 as part of the pre-conditions, if you like, for our 10 support on Iraq, and at Crawford this was subject
11 number 1, because the situation was so bad, the Intifada 12 was so bad, but you are saying it really wasn't 13 surprising that the Americans, despite all that, moved 14 so slowly?

15 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I'm not saying they didn't try, I'm just 16 saying those are very intractable problems.

17 SIR RODERIC LYNE: But we felt they could have gone faster 18 with it, despite it being a very intractable problem?

19 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: They could have tried harder.

20 SIR RODERIC LYNE: They could have tried harder. Thank you.

21 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: It wasn't my original question but 22 just following on from that, I remember hearing during 23 2002 a number of arguments from Americans that the road 24 to peace in the Middle East went through Baghdad, that 25 somehow this was going to make matters easier. Did you

1 remember discussions on that? Did you ever see any 2 merit in that view?

3 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: It wasn't the sort of thing that I heard
4 from my opposite numbers in the State Department. It
5 was part, I think, of President Bush's rhetoric at one 6 stage, so it was rather on the sort of neo-con tendency, 7 that somehow, if democracy would break out in Iraq, and 8 then, lo and behold, democracy would break out in 9 Palestine and this would be a terrifically good thing.
10 It would have been, but we didn't think it likely.

11 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: Did you have discussions with the 12 Israelis on this issue, on what they thought about Iraq?

13 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: We were in touch with the Israelis.
14 I saw the Israeli ambassador here from time to time.
15 They, of course, had a keen interest in what we were 16 planning to do in Iraq, and within the region, 17 ironically, probably Israel and Iran took -- they were 18 the two states that took the most positive view of the 19 removal of Saddam Hussein, for obvious reasons.

20 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: Thank you.

21 My question was going back to what you were saying 22 before about the aftermath of the war -- and obviously 23 we are going to come into this in some detail and what 24 happened after the war, but I would be interested in how 25 you saw thing in terms of preparations for the aftermath

1 on the eve of the war in March? How concerned were you 2 about preparations?

3 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think we were all very concerned at 4 the lack of preparations in terms of what we could see 5 happening in Washington. What was happening there was 6 that the rather detailed work that had already been done 7 by the State Department over many months, didn't seem to 8 be finding its way into the policy-making, the 9 preparation for the aftermath, which was all in the 10 hands of the Pentagon. The Pentagon took the decision 11 to set up this organisation, ORHA, and appoint an 12 ex-General to be in charge of it.

13 But there was a certain disregard -- an 14 unwillingness, I think, to use the State Department 15 expertise to devise a policy and -- or indeed to attach 16 some of the experts who actually knew a lot about the 17 region and spoke the language and so on.

18 Again, this goes back to what I was saying earlier 19 about a touching belief that we shouldn't worry so much 20 about the aftermath because it was all going to be 21 sweetness and light.

22 SIR RODERIC LYNE: But you were worried about the 23 aftermath --

24 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Yes.

25 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: -- and you were also arguing very

1 strongly that the UN should have an important role in 2 the aftermath. Had that discussion made any progress
3 by March?

4 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: As I said, we had had these two quite 5 detailed discussions when I had led missions to 6 Washington in November 2002 and January 2003, and 7 I think it was the second of those meetings we had 8 actually sent across -- one of the papers we had sent 9 across was precisely, "I think you may have seen why a 10 new administration in Iraq would be good for US 11 interests". It was spelt out, the points I have already 12 referred to as to why we thought this was a good idea, 13 and we had also tried to underline that this did not 14 mean putting US forces under some sort of UN control.
15 We could understand why that would be unacceptable, but 16 there were already in existence models, possibly from 17 East Timor, where you could have overall UN's blessing
18 for a set-up in which the military was still taken care 19 of by a coalition, establishing a chain of command, and 20 civilian powers were taken care of by a UN special 21 representative, and that was the model that we were 22 advocating.

23 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: I think, as we have heard both from 24 Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Sir David Manning, one of the 25 consequences of the loss of the second resolution and

1 the degree of distrust that developed amongst the 2 Permanent 5 was that it was going to be much harder to 3 find a route for the UN into the aftermath planning, 4 into the actual administration.

5 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: We did get there eventually with 6 a resolution in May 2003, a bit late.

7 THE CHAIRMAN: I think we will be picking that up after the 8 break.

9 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: I'm interested in the anxieties that 10 might have developed, because you spoke earlier about 11 how our political track was running out, but, in 12 practice, a new political track was about to begin, and 13 the disjunction between the two you could see at the 14 time might spell trouble.

15 SIR PETER RICKETTS: You could. If I might just pick up, 16 and we will come on to this after the break, but 17 actually the remarkable thing to me was that we did 18 manage to get 1483 by 22 May. Two months after this 19 catastrophic breakdown in the Permanent 5 unity in the 20 Security Council, we came out with a 27-paragraph 21 extremely complex, detailed important resolution, which 22 provided for a lot of the future administration of 23 Iraq --

24 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: We will be coming to that. There 25 are very specific questions about that.

1 SIR PETER RICKETTS: -- so I think the remarkable thing is 2 how effectively the Security Council did pull together 3 again.

4 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: My concern -- and this is my only 5 point -- is that the views in March, as we were about to 6 go to war, must have been very pessimistic about what 7 was likely to happen, given the state that you have 8 described of American thinking, of the fact that the 9 State Department had done this work, that this was now 10 being disregarded, ORHA had just been set up 11 in February, I think. Was there a warning to Ministers 12 that we just were maybe not prepared enough for what we 13 were about to take over?

14 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think Ministers were aware and indeed, 15 at their level, they constantly stressed to their 16 American opposite numbers the need for proper aftermath 17 planning. The message we got back was -- the message we 18 constantly got from the American side, particularly 19 those that were frustrated with the lack of planning, as 20 they saw it, was, "Please, could we make this clearer at 21 a higher level in the US administration?" Colin Powell 22 didn't need to be convinced, but President Bush and 23 Donald Rumsfeld did.

24 So, yes, we were very concerned that -- I mean, our 25 response was, as I say, to keep feeding in the ideas of 1 what we thought was the sensible way ahead on the issues 2 that the US administration was obviously going to be the 3 greater partner of this enterprise and we were going to 4 be the junior partner, and to offer, which was accepted, 5 people to sit alongside the US opposite numbers, in 6 particular, General Tim Cross, who was basically 7 Jay Garner's number 2, and then we followed up with 8 John Sawers going to Baghdad to be a senior member of 9 the CPA, and a number of others, I think 20 or so,

10 across Whitehall. But that was an attempt to improve 11 what was a pretty dire state of lack of planning.

12 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: In a sense, is it fair to say at 13 this stage that we had a plan for regime toppling but 14 not particularly for regime change?

15 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Just commenting on the eve of war, when 16 you go into a war, you go into a period of complete 17 uncertainty. You never know what is going to happen, 18 and this was one concern we had. We had many others.
19 We had concerns about CBW attack on our troops. We had 20 concerns about Iraqi retaliation against the region, 21 against British assets, against other regional 22 countries. We had a whole series of concerns and we 23 didn't know how long this conflict period would last.

24 In addition, we had concerns about the state of 25 US planning for the aftermath, but it was one of 1 a number of concerns as the peace process ended and the 2 conflict loomed.

3 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: The one thing you did know is, if 4 the campaign was successful, we would be responsible 5 with the United States for Iraq. So we needed some idea 6 of what we were going to do.

7 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Indeed, and we had been doing a lot of 8 detailed planning on that. We were very concerned at 9 the very late stage that the lead on the US side would 10 switch from the State Department to the Pentagon and to 11 Jay Garner. We will perhaps come on to talk about the 12 implications of that, but, yes, we were certainly 13 concerned about that.

14 THE CHAIRMAN: I suppose a state of great uncertainty is an 15 ideal time to take a break.

16 SIR PETER RICKETTS: May I make one more comment, just back 17 on Sir Roderic's point, if you don't mind, one last 18 thought on Crawford and whether there were new policy
19 decisions taken by the British Government in the run-up 20 to it?

21 Just to leave it on the record, my own perception 22 was that the Prime Minister did not go to Crawford with 23 any new policy decision to put to President Bush.
24 I think President Bush's confirmation that he had asked 25 for some planning to be done in CentCom moved us on to 1 a new phase, because it then became necessary for the 2 British Government to decide how to engage with that 3 planning and how to take that forward, but I don't 4 feel -- I know that Sir Christopher has talked about 5 having new instructions. I think he was referring to 6 the approach that Sir David Manning took in his meeting 7 with Condoleezza Rice just before Crawford, where he had 8 begun to set out the position that, if the Americans 9 wanted to establish a coalition, then they would need to 10 meet the conditions laid down by their coalition, but it 11 felt to me at the time like this was not a new departure 12 in British policy, but following the confirmation in 13 Crawford, we were in a new phase of planning. Decisions 14 really only came much later.

15 THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you. Let's break now and for those in 16 the room who would like to share the break and go 17 outside, please be back within ten minutes, because then 18 we will have to close the doors and that will be it for 19 the rest of the morning, I am afraid, for those of you 20 who don't make it in time. Thank you.

21 (11.23 am)

22 (Short break)

23 (11.40 am)

24 THE CHAIRMAN: I think it will have been obvious to all of 25 us that we have been having some microphone problems

1 through the morning. So we are going to try a different 2 seating arrangement, tweaking various elements of the 3 system. I hope it will work better, but I beg your 4 indulgence. We will try to make it work as well as we 5 can, as soon as we can. That said, and if you could 6 hear me say that, I will turn to Baroness Prashar to 7 open the questioning.

8 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Thank you very much indeed, 9 Chairman.

10 I want to look at the whole question of the 11 post-conflict planning, but before I get into that, 12 Sir Peter, you said before the break that there was 13 a presumption there will be a military operation, but 14 that regime change wasn't the objective, but was 15 a consequence.

16 Now, against that background, what sort of planning 17 was taking place about the aftermath?

18 SIR PETER RICKETTS: We started planning in the autumn of 19 2002, and at that point, of course, it wasn't clear 20 exactly what scenario there would be in terms of a new 21 regime in Iraq, but we assumed, I think, from that point 22 onwards, that we would be dealing with an Iraq without 23 Saddam Hussein and in the aftermath of a military 24 intervention.

25 Therefore, we based our planning on the assumption

1 that the right vehicle for that would be the UN, which 2 had had extensive experience of post-conflict
3 stabilisation work in a number of different countries.
4 But we looked at a range of scenarios and a range of 5 possible outcomes from ones where it might be possible 6 to work with large parts of the previous Iraqi 7 administration to scenarios where it would not, and we 8 had to look at a fairly wide range of scenarios.

9 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: What were your objectives? What did 10 you want to achieve?

11 SIR PETER RICKETTS: That's back to the end-state that we 12 worked out, that I talked about in earlier evidence. In 13 other words, we focused on removing Saddam Hussein's 14 weapons of mass destruction, in the process ensuring 15 that Iraq was able to safeguard his territorial 16 integrity, to have a government that represented all of 17 the people, respected human rights, was a good neighbour 18 in the region rather than a source of instability. We 19 had a number of objectives set out in the end-state, 20 which, as I say, we began drafting in April 2002 and 21 which was incorporated into the military plans.

22 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Can you give me some detail in terms 23 of what were the structures and the processes for 24 post-conflict planning in the FCO and across Whitehall?

25 SIR PETER RICKETTS: From the summer or autumn of 2002, the

1 Cabinet Office, Sir David Manning and his team in the 2 Cabinet Office were taking an interest in this and the 3 FCO were leading work on a large part of that planning.
4 Initially, it was done from our Middle East department 5 under Edward Chaplin, among the many other things they 6 had to do. We devoted more and more people to that as 7 the autumn went on into the early part of 2003 and, 8 by February 2003, we formed a separate unit to 9 concentrate on planning for the post-conflict period.

10 But, of course, we were not the only actors. Other 11 departments around Whitehall were very involved as well 12 and had to be involved. The MoD, of course, because 13 there had to be a clear meshing with the military 14 planning, but also DFID, and DFID's particular focus in 15 the pre-conflict period for the post-conflict period was 16 on the humanitarian issues, and DFID led work in 17 Whitehall in preparation for the humanitarian emergency 18 that we assumed would follow immediately from any 19 military action.

20 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Was this a question of coordination 21 with other government departments or was it a kind of 22 policy planning across the government departments?

23 SIR PETER RICKETTS: It was certainly a question of 24 coordination. It began more as a policy planning 25 exercise, when we were still clearly in a contingency

1 phase, as the likelihood of military action became more
2 and more strong, it acquired a much more operational 3 focus and we began to plan operationally for deployment
4 of people in support of ORHA, the humanitarian responses 5 through DFID, and then all the other aspects of 6 planning. So it became more operational as the months 7 went on.

8 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: What advice were you giving to the 9 Ministers at Number 10 at this stage and up to the 10 aftermath?

11 SIR PETER RICKETTS: First of all, that it had to be taken 12 extremely seriously; secondly, that we were very 13 doubtful indeed about the neo-con assumption that 14 international forces would be welcomed as liberators
15 and, as Mr Chaplin was saying, that somehow very quickly 16 Iraqi political life would resume and the occupying 17 forces would not carry these responsibilities. We were 18 very doubtful about that. We warned Ministers that this 19 would be a long period of post-conflict work for the 20 international community, which is why we then said that 21 we thought it was important that, if possible, the UN 22 should take on the lead.

23 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Was this advice being listened to?

24 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Absolutely, and Mr Blair and the 25 Foreign Secretary, in their many conversations, always

1 made a point, I think, of stressing to the US that they 2 must take planning for post-conflict Iraq just as 3 seriously as planning for any military operation.

4 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: But how did you know about the wider 5 Iraqi politics and society, given the fact that there
6 had been no sort of Embassy there for a number of years?

7 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Shall I pick up on that? We had 8 a number of sources. As I think I mentioned earlier, 9 our embassy in Amman had a watching brief on Iraq, and 10 actually Amman's not a bad watching post for that, a lot 11 of Iraqi exiles there and a lot of trade with the 12 country. That included diplomats from time to time 13 visiting Baghdad and southern Iraq. We had a lot of 14 contacts with exiled groups, most of whom seemed to be 15 in London -- I mean, they were in London and Washington, 16 but a lot of them were in Washington, and they would be 17 in regular contact with the people who worked with me in 18 the Middle East department.

19 We had contacts with close allies, like the French 20 and others, who had long experience of, and still had 21 representation in, Iraq, and then we had a number of 22 academic institutions. Everyone was focusing very much 23 on this issue, and Sir Lawrence Freedman has already 24 mentioned the meeting of academics in Number 10. But 25 there were other -- you know, Chatham House and others

1 were convening all sorts of interesting experts and we 2 tried to keep up with that as much as possible. There 3 was a huge flood of academic work and journalistic work 4 going on.

5 So I don't think we lacked for sources of 6 information, but I think one of the problems is that 7 actually nobody outside Iraq, including Iraqi exiles, 8 quite realised how broken Iraqi society had become in 9 the last few years under Saddam Hussein and the pressure 10 of sanctions and so on.

11 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: But you made no attempt to fill 12 these gaps. Why was there such a lack of information 13 about Iraq?

14 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I don't think there was a lack of 15 information. As I have described, it came from multiple 16 sources and we tried keep in touch with it. What I am 17 saying is the information compiled outside Iraq didn't 18 necessarily accurately reflect the reality inside Iraq, 19 and nobody really had that information.

20 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: You were in Jordan at the time?

21 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I was in Jordan from May 2000
22 until April 2002.

23 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: How would you characterise your 24 coverage on the reporting of Iraq during that time?

25 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: We reported on it constantly because it

1 was of deep concern to the Jordanian Government.

2 The discussions we had with the Jordanian Government
3 in this period were more about what we were going to do
4 about the sanctions regime. Jordan, you may remember, 5 at the time of the first Gulf War, had to deal with 6 a lot of popular support for Saddam Hussein and that 7 popular support was very much still there.

8 One of the problems that I think previous witnesses 9 have referred to, about the weakening of the 10 containment, was that the sanctions regime and the 11 Oil For Food programme was seen as some sort of 12 collective punishment of the Iraqi people and made the 13 Jordanians very upset. So there was quite a lot of 14 pressure on the government.

15 This goes back to the double standards we were 16 talking about earlier, because, of course, similar 17 suffering was being seen on the same television screens 18 of Al Jazeera and others of Palestinians suffering from 19 what the Israelis were doing. So it was quite powerful.

20 But the main Jordanian concern at that time was what 21 our narrowing and deepening of sanctions would actually 22 mean for them, because, as I mentioned earlier, I think,
23 they were very heavily dependent on Iraq for their oil 24 supplies -- oil was supplied at a very favourable 25 price -- and very dependent on the export of goods --

1 which was perfectly legitimate -- under a Memorandum of 2 Understanding, which was very important to the Jordanian 3 economy. So they were very nervous that what we were 4 proposing to do with the narrowing of the sanctions 5 would have a bad effect on them, particularly as the 6 Iraqis made it very clear that if Jordan was to support 7 that change or take part in any of the ideas being 8 talked about, for example, of reinforcing monitoring on 9 the borders, then those favours would be cancelled; 10 there would be no more trade, there would be no more 11 oil.

12 Therefore, a lot of the discussion at that time, 13 when I was in Oman, was about whether, if it came to 14 that, other Arab states would step in and provide Jordan
15 with some sort of safety net; in other words, supplies 16 of oil at a similarly favourable price and outlets for 17 their goods.

18 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Going back to the planning, because 19 I do really want to understand, in terms of the planning 20 that was going on in the UK, who was dealing with that 21 in the United States and what were the links between the 22 two governments on that?

23 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Well, in the early stages, it was being 24 led by the State Department and I think I mentioned 25 earlier, the Future of Iraq Project and I think you have

1 probably seen some of the papers that that produced.
2 Very detailed drawing on Iraqi sources, a lot of Iraqi 3 exiles were involved, as I understand, drawing those up.

4 But, as has already been described, the 5 State Department, having been in the lead, then lost the 6 lead to the Pentagon, and the Pentagon had a rather 7 different approach and we have already been into that.
8 They had a different approach in the assumptions they 9 made about what would follow military invasion. They 10 had a different approach in wanting to have nothing to 11 do, or as little to do as possible, with the 12 United Nations, but they were very much leading it and 13 it was they who set up the ORHA organisation.

14 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: What steps, if any, did they take to 15 involve us in the thinking and planning?

16 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: They didn't take many steps to involve 17 their own colleagues in the administration in planning.
18 On the other hand, they were perfectly happy to listen
19 to us. Whenever I went to Washington, on those two 20 missions I led in November 2002 and January 2003, I was 21 received in the Pentagon, but actually the main 22 discussions were in the National Security Council and 23 chaired, as I recall, by Elliot Abrams, at which all the 24 relevant departments were represented.

25 So it wasn't that they didn't listen, and they were

1 grateful for the papers that we provided and the ideas 2 that we provided, but I don't think the main ideas we 3 were putting forward, in particular about, as we saw it 4 the Whitehall necessity of getting the UN involved in 5 the administration, I don't think those ideas got much 6 traction where they counted, which was with the 7 Pentagon.

8 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Did we make a very strenuous effort 9 to influence them? Because the picture one is getting 10 is that communication was taking place between 11 Number 10, the Prime Minister, the President, 12 Condoleezza Rice and Sir David Manning, and the 13 conversations taking place between yourselves and the 14 Foreign Secretary and Colin Powell. But was this part 15 of the problem, that there was not across the board 16 communications, or were we actually talking to the wrong 17 people?

18 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think these points were made at all 19 levels up to and including the Prime Minister talking to 20 President Bush.

21 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: What was the response?

22 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: The response was usually, "Yes, we hear 23 what you are saying, and you may have a point there", 24 and so on, but it just never translated further down 25 into a change of direction by ORHA.

1 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I think to make just one point, I think
2 the decision that Secretary Rumsfeld and the ORHA 3 organisation should be given the lead was an internal 4 organisational decision that we didn't have much
5 visibility of or traction on in the end, and I think it
6 reflected the fact that, at that point, with a war
7 impending, the Pentagon was the dominant policy player
8 in Washington, and that is something that, in the end, 9 we were not able to have very much traction on.

10 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: But we were not -- how much of this 11 was kind of conditioned by the fact that the 12 conversations were very much focusing on regime change 13 and there wasn't much attention being paid in the 14 United States to the aftermath?

15 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I don't think it was so much that, 16 I think it was that, with war looming, and with the 17 Pentagon the key policy-making department on that, they 18 were also able to get for themselves the lead on 19 post-conflict work as well.

20 I suppose it seemed to them that it made sense to 21 put both of those elements into a single whole, but, in 22 fact, what it did was take away from the 23 State Department the lead in an area that they had been 24 working on over several months, and I think in practice 25 meant that ORHA started with very little time, very 1 little expertise, very few people on what turned out to 2 be an enormous undertaking that it was too big for.

3 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Of course, the widely recognised 4 problems with the Organisation of Reconstruction and 5 Humanitarian Assistance, and, of course, the Coalition
6 Provisional Authority. But what was your understanding 7 of the problems and what did the FCO and the government 8 as a whole do to address these?

9 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Shall I perhaps start and then ask 10 Mr Chaplin to take up the story?

11 When it was clear that ORHA was going to be given 12 the lead on the US side, I suppose we had a choice of 13 either to join in or stand back from it. Since we were 14 participating in the military action, we had 15 a responsibility to be part of the post-conflict 16 stabilisation work, and, therefore, we decided to opt in 17 to ORHA, to send people into ORHA and to engage with 18 them.

19 All our planning assumed that, at the moment the 20 fighting stopped, it would have to be for the coalition 21 armed forces to provide the initial security and the 22 initial humanitarian support to the population, because 23 security wouldn't allow civilians to operate there. So 24 it was clear that there was going to be a very initial 25 phase where it was the responsibility of armed forces.

1 It is like that in every conflict.

2 But then it became clear that this ORHA organisation
3 would move in from Kuwait and would take over civilian 4 responsibilities. But there we come to an area where 5 there was a disagreement between London and Washington
6 and that was on the legal powers that an occupying power 7 has in a country under occupation.

8 I think we were probably more concerned about the 9 legal authority of ORHA and we were clear -- the legal 10 experts can give you more evidence on this -- that 11 absent a UN Security Council Resolution, then our 12 occupation was governed by the fourth Geneva Convention
13 and the 1907 Hague powers, which are fairly restrictive 14 in what they allow occupying forces to do. You can give 15 them some responsibilities, but they are fairly 16 restrictive.

17 That's why we pressed forward quickly for 18 a comprehensive Security Council Resolution which gave 19 us the authority --

20 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: This is 1483?

21 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Yes, but that took until 22 May to 22 achieve, and in that period we were participating in 23 ORHA, but under some constraint, because our view of the 24 legal obligations was fairly narrow, whereas I think it 25 is fair to say that on the US side they were getting on

1 with it and they had a more extensive view of what ORHA 2 should be doing.

3 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: But this resolution, as I understand
4 it, you know, recognised the US and the UK, but did not 5 sort of endorse it. Is that ...?

6 SIR PETER RICKETTS: As I said before, I think it is a very 7 impressive piece of work eight weeks after the Security
8 Council were so divided and it provides in some detail
9 for the administration of Iraq including Oil For Food 10 and oil revenues and the development of Iraq.

11 The most tricky policy point in the drafting, 12 I think, was the relationship between the UN and the 13 coalition, the -- the "authority" as it is called in the 14 resolution, and the resolution provides that there will 15 be a special representative of the UN, which became 16 Mr Vieira de Mello, and he would work in coordination 17 with the authority, but the UN were very concerned not 18 to be subjugated to the authority of the coalition.

19 Equally, as Mr Chaplin has said, there were many on 20 the American side who didn't want to feel that they had 21 lost the initiative to the UN. So the resolution 22 reflects a careful balance providing for close 23 coordination effectively. It goes back to an agreement
24 which Mr Blair and President Bush struck at the Belfast 25 summit shortly after the fighting in which it was agreed

1 that the UN would have a vital role. The Americans 2 accepted that. That was then translated into 1483, but 3 it was a very important text for giving British 4 officials and workers the authority we felt we needed.

5 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Can I go back to a point you 6 mentioned earlier, that you decided to work with the 7 organisation and you sent some people? You seconded
8 some people to this organisation. What sort of people 9 did you send and what kind of skills did they have?

10 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Well, the most senior person we sent in 11 the initial stages was Tim Cross, who was a retired 12 General but with some relevant experience, I think, in 13 post-conflict work.

14 Then really we responded to US demands on our own 15 perception of where we could most add value in sending 16 other people -- well, other senior people. Of course, 17 we sent later, John Sawers to be part of the Coalition 18 Provisional Authority. But there were others from 19 across Whitehall with particular expertise who fitted 20 into gaps that the Americans said needed filling.

21 We hoped that by putting people alongside their US 22 counterparts that we would be able to exert some direct 23 influence on what they were planning to do. But the -- 24 that wasn't always easy.

25 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: What was the reporting mechanism?

1 You had people on the ground. Were they reporting back
2 to you what was happening?

3 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: One of the problems with the lack of 4 planning by ORHA was lack of decent communications.

5 THE CHAIRMAN: Sorry to interrupt, do you mean physical 6 communications?

7 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Yes, email and other communications. So 8 in terms of finding out what was going on on the ground,
9 we did have communications. Of course we were setting 10 up in parallel our own embassy as well, but most people 11 were using unclassified email to communicate in the 12 early weeks and it took some time to sort out decent 13 communications. Even communications within Baghdad
14 weren't all that good, let alone with capitals.

15 SIR PETER RICKETTS: One other point perhaps to add is 16 because we, on the military side, took particular 17 responsibility for the south, the southern provinces, 18 I think our contributions to ORHA tended to be 19 concentrated in the southern province as well. So we 20 were taking on quite a lot of responsibility for the 21 civilian presence in the south as well as the military 22 presence.

23 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Do you feel that you had the right 24 people and the resources and the people in the right 25 places immediately after the invasion?

1 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I think in the immediate aftermath we 2 had, I think, about 20 of the 200 or so people who 3 deployed into Iraq from Kuwait in those early days.
4 Therefore, I think we were making a very proportionate 5 contribution.

6 I think we struggled to increase the numbers of 7 trained civilians who were prepared to deploy. As the 8 need grew, we found it more difficult and, indeed, by 9 mid-April, we were formally asking other government 10 departments around Whitehall to provide officials or 11 contract people who could go out and fulfil these roles, 12 but we found it hard to increase the numbers of 13 civilians at the rate required. I think that's true.

14 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: I think Sir Roderic Lyne wants to 15 come in.

16 SIR RODERIC LYNE: Yes. I just wanted to make sure that I'm 17 clear about a couple of points that we have covered 18 since the break.

19 Mr Chaplin, in describing the early stages of the 20 aftermath planning, the British Government was working 21 on the assumption that the United Nations would play the 22 central role in the post-conflict administration of 23 Iraq. Was this assumption shared at least in the early 24 stages of the planning process by the US administration 25 or not?

1 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: No. Certainly, once the lead had been 2 taken by the Pentagon, they made it very clear that they 3 were not going to, I think in their phrase, "hand over 4 Iraq to the UN", quote, unquote. That didn't mean in 5 the end that the Americans saw absolutely no role for 6 the United Nations, and, indeed, after the passage of 7 1483, there was quite a considerable role for the UN,
8 but in the early stages, the messages from Washington 9 were they were going to do it on their own, thank you 10 very much.

11 SIR RODERIC LYNE: So we thought the UN were going to do it, 12 they were determined that the UN were not going to do 13 it. Were we discussing our assumptions with the 14 United Nations Secretariat?

15 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I can't remember that in detail.
16 I think -- I'm sure we were in touch with different 17 members of the UN Secretariat, preparing for what we 18 thought would be inevitable, and indeed turned out to be 19 the case, that sooner or later they were going to be 20 playing a role. So we wanted to be in touch with them 21 to see what sort of role they thought they could play.

22 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Just one point: through much of this 23 planning process we were working on the assumption that 24 there would be a second resolution and Security Council 25 backing for the military phase, which we thought would

1 then lead naturally on to a leading UN role in the 2 immediate post-conflict phase.

3 I think the failure to get a second resolution and 4 the acrimonious dispute in the Security Council, which 5 we talked about earlier this morning, made it more
6 difficult actually for Kofi Annan and the UN to play 7 a prominent role in the early aftermath.

8 SIR RODERIC LYNE: But if the UN were going to take over 9 immediately after a conflict in a large country, surely 10 they would have needed quite a considerable time to gear 11 up for this and plan for it?

12 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: That's one of the reasons why we wanted 13 more time; not just to give a greater chance for 14 a peaceful resolution, a longer inspection time, the 15 setting of ultimatums and so on that we covered before 16 the break, but also so there would be more time for 17 planning.

18 SIR RODERIC LYNE: So actually, it wasn't really realistic
19 to think that they could do this from a standing start 20 in a very short period? It just wasn't have been 21 feasible?

22 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: No. That is probably fair.
23 Nevertheless, what we would want to happen was agreement
24 that the UN should come in at the earliest possible
25 stage, and the UN can, as you know, gear themselves up

1 quite quickly sometimes.

2 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I worry that we may be conflating 3 timescales here. At the period we were developing our 4 thinking about UN lead in the summer of 2002, autumn of 5 2002, winter of 2002, it was not clear at all timing of 6 the military action might happen, indeed whether it 7 would happen at all, and whether there would have been 8 full UN authorisation in the second resolution for it.

9 So at that period, we were talking in more general 10 terms with the UN. By the time it became clear, the 11 timescale for military action, I think it was then also 12 clear that the US would not be prepared to have UN
13 administration. Therefore, by then we were on the track
14 of working with ORHA. But I think it was a reasonable 15 planning assumption in the autumn of 2002 that we could 16 work for a UN transitional authority, and at that time
17 the UN still had time prepare for it.

18 SIR RODERIC LYNE: Despite the fact that, the autumn of 19 2002, it must have been pretty clear that there was very 20 little enthusiasm in the UN, either in the Secretariat 21 or among other member states, for military action 22 against Iraq. We really had to struggle after all to 23 get the first resolution.

24 SIR PETER RICKETTS: We got the first resolution 25 unanimously, which certainly provided the possibility

1 that there would be a further material breach and,
2 therefore, the possibility that there would be military
3 action.

4 At that time, I think it was, you know, entirely 5 reasonable to look forward, even in those circumstances, 6 to a UN-led transitional authority. As time went on, 7 that became less and less easy for the UN to work with.

8 SIR RODERIC LYNE: So this ended up putting us in a very 9 difficult position, because we went on until quite 10 a late stage in the assumption, or at least the hope, 11 that the UN would come in and pick up the pieces after 12 the conflict, and then we found ourselves in what you 13 might call Colin Powell Pottery Barn territory, "If you 14 break it, you fix it", and, at rather short notice, we 15 and the United States had to become the fixers.

16 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I think that was one of the 17 consequences of the breakdown of consensus in the 18 Security Council.

19 SIR RODERIC LYNE: My other question is about again coming 20 back to the question of what we expected to happen after 21 the campaign, and I think you have made it clear that we 22 certainly did not share the rosy assumptions of many in 23 the United States administration that this was going to 24 be, as one administration author put it, a "cake-walk".

25 Equally, Mr Chaplin said that we didn't fully

1 comprehend how fractured Iraqi society had become under 2 Saddam Hussein.

3 Now, you, I'm sure, would have been comparing notes 4 very intensively in this period with other countries in 5 the region, neighbours of Iraq, and also with our 6 European partners, other people who had perspectives on 7 Iraq, some of whom had embassies there, as well as with 8 outside experts.

9 Were there others outside the British Government who 10 were warning that there was a high risk of ethnic and 11 sectarian conflict after a military campaign, that the 12 Iraqis, given the history of Iraq from 1920 onwards, 13 were quite likely both to turn on each other and to turn 14 against the occupiers?

15 You said that we were warning that the status of 16 liberator would quickly turn into occupier. Did other 17 people see this as a bigger risk than it was seen within 18 the Foreign Office and the British Government?

19 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think, as you would expect,
20 particularly with a difficult subject like Iraq, there 21 was a range of views being expressed by outsiders -- of 22 course, some of those outsiders had their own agendas.
23 If you start from a position of principle that the 24 invasion of Iraq was a very bad thing, then you tend to 25 amass the evidence to underline it is a very bad thing

1 because of the dreadful consequences that will follow, 2 but there was a lot of perfectly sound analysis going on 3 which did indeed point out the dangers of ethnic and 4 sectarian strife.

5 Some of it was a bit exaggerated, I felt. The idea
6 that Iraq would split into three neat sectarian parts.
7 I never thought -- and indeed the academics I talked to 8 never thought it was very likely. Indeed, I think one 9 of the points brought out in the meeting we have already 10 referred to of the academics who came to Number 10 was 11 that there was a much more nationalist spirit in Iraq 12 than one might expect looking at it from the outside.

13 I think over the years, one of the ways that 14 Saddam Hussein had survived was going back to, if you 15 like, a classic divide and rule, but using the tribes 16 and different ethnic groups, playing off one against the 17 other in order to keep control himself.

18 That had produced a mindset which meant that -- and 19 there was also of course a regime of complete fear, 20 certainly as far as the Shias and the Kurds were 21 concerned, so that's what I'm thinking of when I'm 22 referring to a near-destroyed society, which made it 23 more difficult to pick up the pieces than we and 24 certainly the Americans had expected.

25 SIR RODERIC LYNE: What I'm groping for here is, how strong

1 was the professional advice that was going up to 2 Ministers that a likely consequence of military action
3 against Iraq would be ethnic and sectarian conflict?

4 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: It was certainly flagged up from an 5 early stage from the middle of 2002, certainly in papers
6 that went up from me and from my departments, that a lot 7 depended on the circumstances in which military action 8 would be taken. I think we've covered some of that, the 9 legitimacy argument, but there was a risk of being stuck 10 with responsibility for chronic instability in Iraq.

11 But the effort, if you like, was then put into 12 trying to convince particularly the Americans that we 13 needed to contrive the circumstances in which those 14 risks were at least reduced, to give ourselves the best 15 possible chance of success in rebuilding Iraq after 16 military action.

17 SIR RODERIC LYNE: But we didn't contrive those 18 circumstances?

19 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: We didn't and we needed a number of 20 things, including more time, to do that.

21 SIR RODERIC LYNE: Or the coalition didn't, to be fair, with 22 one's "we".

23 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Yes, but I think it was not inevitable 24 that military action would have been followed by the 25 sort of degree of ethnic and sectarian violence that we

1 saw, and in the planning, if things had got better, 2 particularly early law and order and a better grip on 3 security in Baghdad, it might not have happened that 4 way.

5 So again, with hindsight, it looks inevitable and 6 that we should have foreseen the inevitable that was 7 going to be the deep violence we saw. I'm not sure it 8 was inevitable and I think some of the things that went 9 wrong in the early stages of ORHA contributed to that.

10 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I agree with that. I don't know if we 11 are going to come on to talk about decisions on 12 deBa'athification, dissolving the army and so on, but 13 there were a number of factors, you know, decisions that 14 were taken after the invasion which had a very negative 15 impact.

16 THE CHAIRMAN: Sir Lawrence, you wanted a brief
17 intervention? Then we must get back to the question.

18 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: Yes. Some of the ground I wanted to 19 cover has just been covered but I just want to follow up 20 on this inevitability question. Iraq had been run by a 21 Sunni elite with a majority Shia population. Wasn't it 22 always likely that regime change in effect would mean 23 a transfer of power from the Sunni to the Shia and 24 wasn't that always likely to involve a degree of 25 reaction from the Sunni? Rather than splitting into

1 three separate parts, that was always a likely outcome
2 of toppling a Sunni elite regime?

3 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Yes, you are absolutely right.

4 Historically, we, the British, in the mandate years had 5 inherited this from the Ottoman empire, that you used a 6 sort of Sunni officer/administrative class to administer 7 Iraq, and that's how things had been.

8 We did foresee that the inevitable result of 9 democracy, under whatever form, being introduced into 10 Iraq was that the likely outcome would be a Shia
11 majority government and that this would be a traumatic 12 event for the Sunni population. Hence our emphasis on 13 encouraging, in the days of the coalition provisional 14 administration, to visibly reach out to give the message
15 that all parts of Iraqi society, including the, if you 16 like, disenfranchised Sunnis, should have their role to 17 play in the reconstruction of Iraq.

18 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: Thank you.

19 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Can we then move on to 20 deba'athification, because you were saying that it was 21 inevitable.

22 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: No, I didn't say that, I don't think.

23 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: No, you said that the causes of 24 violence post-invasion were not inevitable; it was due 25 to the policy pursued on deba'athification. Can you say

1 a little bit about that?

2 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Well, I think there are a number of 3 things. I think Sir Peter has already referred to one.
4 The first failure was a failure to ensure a secure
5 environment, particularly in Baghdad and the Sunni parts 6 of the country. Things were better in the south, and of 7 course in the north things were different anyway because 8 there had been for some years de facto Kurdish autonomy.
9 But in Baghdad and the central Sunni areas there were 10 simply not enough coalition, in this case US, forces on 11 the ground to ensure law and order.

12 So I think there were a number of factors. That was 13 one factor. The exclusion of the Sunnis or the feeling 14 that they were being excluded from discussion of the 15 future of Iraq was another, which was reinforced by the 16 decisions on deBa'athification and on the dissolution of 17 the army, not that all civil service ministries or all 18 the army were uniquely staffed by Sunnis. That's not 19 the case. But that was certainly a factor which 20 produced a large and alienated and, in many cases, 21 resentful section of the population.

22 If you add to that the fact that the arms dumps, the 23 huge dumps of conventional arms -- never mind WMD but 24 the huge arms dumps -- were not properly guarded or in 25 some cases not guarded at all, so that any disaffected

1 group could go and help itself to arms, then you have,
2 as I think David Manning has already referred to 3 yesterday, a pretty dire situation in terms of security.

4 I think the other factor that was greatly
5 underestimated in the planning was the need to manage 6 Iraqi expectations about how quickly things could be put 7 right, and we certainly suffered this ourselves down in 8 the south. I think for the average Iraqi it seemed 9 reasonable to expect that, once the military action was 10 over, then good things would start to happen in terms of 11 reconstruction, in terms of electricity supply, 12 reconstruction of sewerage systems and so on, and when 13 that didn't happen, it was a short step in the mindset 14 that was part of the legacy of that long period of 15 dictatorship to think that if it wasn't happening, that 16 was because it was a deliberate choice; it couldn't be, 17 could it, that the world's superpower was simply not 18 able to bring those good things about, it must be 19 because they were deliberately deciding not to allow 20 those things to happen, and then you would be off on a 21 sort of conspiracy theory of why that should be.

22 Remember, there were all sorts of rumours around 23 that, because it was some time before Saddam Hussein was 24 found and captured, secretly we were planning to put 25 Saddam Hussein back into power. That may seem

1 incredible now but that was certainly one of the 2 feelings.

3 So what I am saying is there were a number of 4 decisions which contributed to making a very difficult 5 environment for us and a rather benign environment for 6 different terrorist groups to start chipping away at the 7 security. And hence the rapid deterioration in 8 security.

9 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: And what did we do about this?
10 Because we had concerns. And were we still playing a 11 second fiddle to the United States?

12 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Oh, the United States remained the major
13 partner in this enterprise throughout. There is no 14 hiding that. But we did our best to influence them in 15 what we thought was the right direction: by engaging 16 with them, by having people alongside them -- we have 17 already referred to the senior people who were 18 dispatched, as well as more expert people -- and by 19 having a constant dialogue with them about how to 20 improve the situation.

21 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Did we actually at any stage rethink 22 our objectives or try to change policy in response to 23 what we found on the ground?

24 SIR PETER RICKETTS: We certainly did. I think Ministers 25 became aware very quickly that things were not going

1 well on the ground. Jack Straw was certainly aware of 2 that from mid-April, and he was working in Whitehall to 3 gear up the UK contribution. Perhaps most strikingly, 4 the Prime Minister, when he visited in early June, came 5 back with a very forceful sense that ORHA was a shambles
6 and that we needed to move on very rapidly to a much 7 better, tighter organisation.

8 You are seeing, I think, Sir John Sawyer's full 9 evidence shortly and he will be able to speak to you 10 about the position that he found when he arrived on 11 8 May as our representative to the CPA, and his early 12 reporting convinced me and others that ORHA absolutely 13 was a mess and that we needed to work very quickly to 14 strengthen it. Ministers were immediately on to their 15 counterparts. We concentrated on making sure that we 16 did as well as we possibly could in the south, which was 17 the particular area that we had been given 18 responsibility for.

19 But John Sawers and then with Bremer, when he 20 arrived a few days later, in the middle of May, 21 immediately tried to get a grip on the organisation, the 22 structure, the leadership, the coordination, to get 23 a functional organisation working.

24 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: I mean, we are in the realms of 25 lessons learned. In retrospect, are there things that

1 you could have done differently or better in terms of 2 planning?

3 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Well, to give my response to that,
4 I think the crucial problems arose from the late 5 decisions in the US to put a department and an 6 organisation in charge which had not been prepared for 7 this role. I do think, if the careful State Department 8 work had been allowed to feed through into operational 9 planning for the post-conflict phase, that would have 10 been more successful. I think it would have been easier 11 for us to dock with it, and the overall effect on the 12 ground would, I think, have been a stronger operation 13 from earlier on.

14 So I think that was one lesson that I would have 15 learned: don't switch the lead in post-conflict 16 stabilisation work just before the conflict breaks out 17 because that will guarantee you that the organisation 18 that hits the ground isn't functional.

19 I think on the UK side we certainly did learn 20 lessons about having a better mechanism for generating 21 civilian co-capability: experts trained, prepared, ready 22 to deploy into these sorts of situations. We now have 23 in Whitehall a stabilisation unit with a large database 24 of people who are prepared to go and work in Iraq and 25 Afghanistan. That's a direct legacy of the difficulty

1 we had in assembling the right numbers of civilians
2 early on in this crisis.

3 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Mr Chaplin, do you have any views?

4 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Yes, I agree with all of that.

5 I suppose the main lesson learned was you have to have 6 a strategy and have a proper plan. You do a lot more 7 preparatory work than was done in this case to prepare 8 for post-military phase, and crucial to that is 9 something we have already referred to about contriving 10 circumstances in which you have maximum legitimacy and 11 therefore maximum support, and learn the lesson that 12 even a power with the resources at its disposal that the 13 United States has cannot do nation-building on that 14 scale on its own, and therefore you do need the UN 15 organisation heavily involved.

16 When you have done all that and you have got 17 a decent plan and an idea of what you are aiming for, 18 then you need to identify the resources that are 19 necessary to carry that out, and Sir Peter has already 20 referred to the lesson learned about -- it was certainly 21 one of the constraints in the early months -- seeing the 22 need for additional expertise but not having the 23 mechanisms to identify, train and dispatch those people 24 anything like quickly enough.

25 SIR PETER RICKETTS: These are not just diplomats and

1 administrators, of course. They are people who know how 2 to run power stations, sewage plants,
3 electricity-generating works, judges, lawyers, prison
4 administrators. You need an enormous range of skills 5 available very quickly.

6 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: Would you say that in the run-up to 7 the invasion too much effort was put into diplomacy and 8 not much attention was paid to the aftermath?

9 SIR PETER RICKETTS: No, I wouldn't accept that. I think it 10 is always possible to say we should have paid more 11 attention to the aftermath. I believe that the intense
12 efforts that were put into diplomacy from September 2002
13 to March 2003, in which I was involved every single day, 14 I think, of that period, were worth it because I think 15 there was all along a chance that it would have given 16 Saddam Hussein the opportunity to comply and therefore 17 to have avoided war, and I think the consequences of 18 war, as we are talking about now, are so serious that it 19 is right to break every sinew in trying to avoid war.

20 That said, we did put a lot of effort into planning 21 the aftermath alongside the feverish work on diplomacy
22 to avoid war. No doubt we could have done even more.

23 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: No, my question was -- of course, 24 the right effort had to be put into diplomacy but was 25 there not much effort put into scenario planning,

1 because there could have been different scenarios and 2 were different scenarios looked at and were they 3 probably considered, discussed?

4 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I think there was a lot of effort put 5 into post-conflict planning. Could we have done more on 6 individual scenarios? It is always possible to say that 7 one could do more. I think we needed a plan that was 8 sufficiently flexible to respond to any scenario that 9 arose after the conflict.

10 As I said earlier, when you cross the Rubicon into 11 military conflict, you then really don't know how it is 12 going to end, how quickly it is going to end and what 13 situation you inherit, and therefore the planning, I 14 think, has to be pretty flexible.

15 BARONESS USHA PRASHAR: I think Sir Lawrence wants to come 16 in.

17 THE CHAIRMAN: I've just got one question of my own. In 18 this tale of uncertainty and mounting chaos in the 19 immediate aftermath because of the security breakdown, 20 there was one shining light and that was the achievement 21 of the May UN mandate. I wonder if either of you would 22 like to say a little bit about how that was achieved, 23 given that the P5 had been completely fractured by the 24 invasion and the failure the second resolution line, and 25 yet within weeks it was possible to get a unanimous

1 mandate for the coalition partners. How was this 2 achieved?

3 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Well, I think it is a tribute to the 4 professionalism of the diplomats concerned in the UN and 5 their governments that people very rapidly accepted the 6 reality, whether they liked it or not, of the conflict 7 and therefore the need to make provision for the 8 post-conflict arrangements, and the UK was certainly, 9 very early on, drafting, thinking about, elements for 10 a post-conflict resolution, partly driven, as I said
11 earlier, by our acute sense that the responsibilities 12 and the authorities of an occupying power are very 13 limited, and we knew, therefore, that we needed very 14 rapidly to move on to updating that authority. Not 15 least, we needed to amend the Oil For Food resolution to 16 take account of the new circumstances, we needed to 17 amend the sanctions regime to take account of the new 18 circumstances, we needed to regulate the Iraqi oil 19 revenues and make sure that they were directed for the 20 wellbeing of the Iraqi people. A whole series of 21 complex, urgent, difficult issues, and I think it is not 22 boastful to say that the UK was at the forefront of work
23 in the Security Council, led by Sir Jeremy Greenstock, 24 to get that going again, and it is very interesting 25 actually that, once we were through this traumatic

1 period of the breakdown in mid-March and on to the next 2 period, we worked very well actually with the French and 3 others in the Security Council, in a pragmatic spirit
4 that we were where we were and we now needed to regulate 5 the post-conflict situation in Iraq. Quite quickly, the 6 P5 and the wider members of the Security Council were 7 able to work and produce this very substantial 8 resolution within eight weeks.

9 THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you. Sir Lawrence and then
10 Sir Roderic.

11 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: I just want to go back to scenarios 12 and ORHA. Part of its name is "humanitarian 13 assistance". To what extent was it geared, not to the 14 scenarios of post-war, but the scenarios of war itself 15 and in particular the risk of widespread humanitarian 16 distress resulting from military action?

17 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: Shall I deal with that first?

18 That was actually the one part of US planning that 19 was quite advanced and quite detailed, and I suppose 20 what people had in mind was the first Gulf War, which 21 produced a huge flow of refugees, for example, across to 22 Jordan and elsewhere, as well as in the north. So there 23 was a lot of planning went into that. In the event, the 24 military action was so rapid that there was much less 25 humanitarian work to be done than had been assumed. But

1 that was certainly one of the bits that was well 2 prepared for, I think, including contact with the 3 relevant UN agencies.

4 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: But in a sense Garner's expertise -- 5 who was head of ORHA -- was in that sort of area, more 6 than in actual reconstruction.

7 Just a second point on this: you have talked about 8 problems of the movement of planning from the 9 State Department to the Pentagon -- and ORHA was under 10 the Pentagon. Even then, wasn't it the case that it had 11 difficulty getting a hearing in Central Command, as 12 being a real priority to get into Iraq and get it 13 moving, that the American military itself had other 14 priorities?

15 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: My perception was there was still 16 difficulty, even after the creation of ORHA, in 17 achieving a settled US view of the right way ahead.
18 There may well have been difficulties also with CentCom
19 and their own separate views about what that way ahead 20 should look like, and I remember it being said, when the 21 ORHA organisation decamped to Kuwait prior to the 22 invasion, that part of that was Garner's determination 23 to get away from the bickering in Washington, which he 24 didn't want to be part of and seemed unable to bring to 25 an end.

1 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: So, even if the planning had stayed 2 with the State Department, there could still have been 3 and probably would have been that sort of problem?

4 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: There certainly would have been 5 a problem, yes.

6 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: Just a final point. You mentioned 7 the problems with the failure to guard arms dumps,
8 clearly there was widespread looting, and so on. Now,
9 I recall -- and I'm sure others do -- many arguments 10 that were made in late 2002 that you really needed half 11 a million troops to be able to do this properly. This 12 was said in senior circles in the United States.
13 James Dobbins, who was probably the State Department's 14 greatest expert on post-conflict situations, who had led 15 the negotiations on Afghanistan, was saying this.

16 Were we saying to the Americans, "You may have 17 enough troops to win a war but you possibly don't have 18 enough troops to control the society afterwards"?

19 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think you would have to ask the 20 military witnesses that because, as I recall -- and 21 Sir Peter may be able to pick up on this -- the detailed 22 exchanges with the Americans about the military planning 23 that was going on was left, naturally enough, to our 24 military, and I think -- I remember the phrase that 25 their job was to come back to our government, to the

1 politicians, with a judgment as to whether or not the 2 Americans had a "winning concept".

3 So, in terms of whether the Americans were planning 4 to put enough boots on the ground to cope with the 5 situation we thought they would face, I don't know 6 whether we particularly emphasised our concern that they 7 were insufficient. What one remembers is that -- 8 I mean, Rumsfeld was, I think, deliberately wanting to 9 set out and prove that you could fight this sort of war 10 with a much lower number of troops than had, for 11 example, been used in the first Gulf War.

12 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I don't have anything to add to that.

13 I think in the pre-conflict period I'm not aware that we 14 had those sorts of discussions. I think in the 15 immediate post-conflict period, when we were buried in 16 (inaudible) the problems in the security around Baghdad, 17 we were in deep discussions with the Americans about how 18 many forces and what sort of forces were needed in 19 Baghdad to provide security after the Third Armoured 20 Division had completed its task of winning the war, as 21 it were.

22 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: If you were going to disband the 23 Iraqi army, again a decision which I seem to recall we 24 had no part in, you were probably going to need more 25 forces of your own?

1 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Yes, but as you say, I don't think that 2 that was a decision foreseen beforehand. I think we 3 were assuming that we would need to remove the senior 4 part of the security forces, of course, but that the 5 police, perhaps the more junior members of the security
6 forces, just as the large part of the Civil Service -- 7 we would be able to use them, rather than find that they 8 were all sacked and we had to take on the 9 responsibilities ourselves.

10 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: One of the many papers we put across to 11 the Americans in the pre-war phase was precisely on the 12 DDR process that -- in other words, the way we had acted 13 in other post-conflict situations elsewhere, in Africa, 14 for example, a process by which you demobilise but at 15 the same time make use of the armed forces that are 16 there.

17 It didn't happen. John Sawers will be able to give 18 you more detail of this and indeed of deba'athification, 19 and it is probably unfair to say with a snap of the 20 fingers it was decreed that this should happen. It may 21 have been how it looked from the outside, but remember 22 that the Iraqi army was largely a conscript army and the 23 army had largely dissolved, people had taken off their 24 uniforms and gone home. So what was needed was a policy 25 to encourage people to come forward and work for the new

1 Iraq and have a vetting process that would make that 2 sensible. That didn't happen.

3 On deba'athification, again I think it is easy to 4 underestimate with hindsight how powerful the feelings 5 were amongst those who had suffered most from 6 Saddam Hussein's regime, that the idea that anybody who 7 had served really at any level of responsibility in the 8 organisation that served Saddam Hussein was acceptable 9 in a post-Saddam Hussein situation was simply 10 anathema -- and I think, if you talk to the military 11 commanders in the south, you will find that we suffered 12 from that ourselves -- that somebody who appeared to be, 13 actually, perfectly competent -- I can't remember the 14 name -- to be Chairman of the governing Council that we 15 set up in Basra, it rapidly turned out that he, for 16 whatever reason -- we couldn't judge whether it was 17 right or wrong -- was simply not acceptable to the local 18 populous because he was too closely identified with the 19 previous regime.

20 So Ba'athification was driven largely by the forces 21 that were now in charge, or potentially in charge; it 22 wasn't just a decision by outsiders.

23 SIR LAWRENCE FREEDMAN: I'm sure we will need to pursue this 24 a bit more but I doubt if we've got time to do it quite 25 now.

1 THE CHAIRMAN: Roderic, last question?

2 SIR RODERIC LYNE: At what point was the concept developed
3 that the UK would perform an exemplary role in the way
4 that it administered the southern regions of Iraq?

5 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Well, the decision that we should go
6 into the south of Iraq followed from the difficulties
7 about introducing forces through Turkey, which I 8 think --

9 SIR RODERIC LYNE: No, I know about going to the south. It 10 is the notion, which I think was enunciated in public, 11 that we would do this in an "exemplary" way. The word 12 "exemplary" was attached, was set as an objective for 13 us. Can you remember when and how and from where that 14 came up?

15 SIR PETER RICKETTS: Isn't that the normal British approach, 16 that if we are going to do something, we do it in an 17 exemplary way? I can't understand that there would be 18 an instruction that we should do it in other than an 19 exemplary way.

20 SIR RODERIC LYNE: No, it sounds entirely praiseworthy, but 21 it became a strapline for our policy.

22 Were the ends willed towards these means? You have 23 said we had difficulty getting enough people. Did we 24 have the financial resources? Had we integrated the 25 Department for International Development sufficiently

1 into the planning process and so on actually to perform
2 the exemplary role that we had set for ourselves?

3 SIR PETER RICKETTS: I think we could have done with more
4 resources to back up the ambition to play an exemplary 5 role. If I remember rightly, the initial costs of the 6 people who were deployed into ORHA were going to be met 7 from the DFID budget, but it took some time to set up 8 arrangements to do that and as the requirement grew, 9 I think it outstripped the logic that had been foreseen.
10 So I think there was an underestimate of the number of 11 people and the cost of the role that we found ourselves 12 playing in the south.

13 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think that's right. I can't remember 14 exactly where "exemplary", which sounds a jolly good 15 thing to have, came from, but if your point is that the 16 resources were never provided to make exemplary 17 performance in our area, the south, a reality, then you 18 are right, they weren't.

19 SIR PETER RICKETTS: It wasn't only a question of money, it 20 was also a question of simply finding the people and 21 that was as difficult, I think, as finding the money.

22 THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you.

23 I think we have come to the end of this session.
24 Just before closing remarks, can I ask Sir Peter and 25 Mr Chaplin: is there anything that you would like to say

1 or would like to add before we close?

2 SIR PETER RICKETTS: No, I think we have covered the ground.

3 Thank you, Mr Chairman.

4 THE CHAIRMAN: Mr Chaplin?

5 MR EDWARD CHAPLIN: I think just one concluding thought, 6 perhaps more as a historical footnote, as someone who 7 was involved back in the '90s in struggling with this 8 regime that simply refused to come into conformity with 9 what the international community was asking for it to 10 do. I mean, there were many repeated attempts to find 11 a peaceful way, there were many attempts to try and make 12 containment work -- and we have been into that -- 13 attempts to refresh the containment mechanism.

14 A historical footnote really, as I think this 15 started to unravel in the late 1990s, in the Security 16 Council, when that trust between, particularly, the 17 permanent members started to break down. The issue then 18 was whether to transition, so to speak, some of the 19 files that UNSCOM was dealing with, in particular the 20 nuclear file, and when that didn't happen because of US
21 opposition, I think the trust amongst the Security 22 Council members that we could see a way forward together 23 started to break down.

24 I think my personal conclusion at the time, in the 25 early 2000s, when I found myself dealing with it again,

1 2002/2003, was that, given the track record and although 2 we should go on giving it every last chance, not least 3 to demonstrate that we were giving it every last chance, 4 a peaceful resolution of the disarmament obligations,
5 which became even more urgent after 9/11, was unlikely 6 and that, therefore, what we had to do -- I referred to 7 this briefly earlier -- was contrive the circumstances 8 in which, if it came to military action, we gave 9 ourselves, the international community, the best chance 10 of coming out with the right result, not just the 11 disarmament of Iraq but the construction of Iraq and 12 achieving all those objectives which we happily set out 13 for ourselves and which were unimpeachable, the ones set 14 out in January 2003, the example, to Parliament. So it 15 was, if you like, the failure to contrive those 16 circumstances that I think is the most serious lack in 17 the lead-up to military action.

18 THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you. I notice already in the course of 19 this Inquiry that the hand of history is heavy on 20 events, and we have had reference already today, not 21 only to the period since 1920 -- although our terms of 22 reference start in 2001, we are highly conscious of that 23 history -- but also back to the Ottoman empire, and for 24 all I know, before we finish, it will go back to 25 pre-historic times.

1 On Thursday morning we are going to hear from 2 Lord Boyce, Lord Michael Boyce, the chief of the defence
3 staff at the time of the invasion, and Sir Kevin Tebbit, 4 who was Permanent Secretary at the Ministry of Defence 5 from 1998 to 2005. So far we have heard a lot of 6 information about the development of government policies
7 and views on Iraq from 2001, the level of threat posed
8 and the UK's relationship with the United States on Iraq 9 in those years.

10 In our next few hearings we will begin to look at 11 how the UK's military participation in the invasion of 12 Iraq was planned from those in the MoD, the options that 13 were considered in that planning, when the key decisions 14 were taken on the military side and how this was linked 15 to the wider diplomatic process.

16 We will also begin to explore how the United Kingdom 17 planned for Iraq after the initial military campaign and 18 the assumptions made -- we got a bit into that today but 19 there is much more to hear -- and what the 20 United Kingdom's military role in that might be.

21 The Committee would like to thank you, our 22 witnesses, for your evidence this morning and to all of 23 those of you who have sat here and attended this hearing 24 through the morning.

25 The next hearing will start at 9 o'clock, not

1 10 o'clock, on Thursday, and there is no hearing
2 tomorrow, Wednesday.

3 So, with that, this session is concluded. Thank you 4 all.
